Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], in whose absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I am informed that if my pair were present he would vote as I intended to vote upon this reservation. I am therefore at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. He is not here, and I have not been able to get a transfer. I am therefore compelled to withdraw my vote.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He desired me to state that he is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], and that if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. I note that he is not in the Chamber and has not voted, and I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 36, as follows:

So Mr. GERRY's reservation was agreed to, as follows:

In consenting to the ratification of the treaty with Germany the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination and to the resolution of sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice adopted by the Senate June 6, 1919, and declares that when such government is attained by Ireland, a consummation it is hoped is at hand, it should promptly be admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

Mr. KELLOGG. I give notice that I shall ask for a separate vote in the Senate upon this reservation.

Mr. GORE. I offered a reservation a few days since, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed reservation.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

The United States understands that no mandatory power shall, without the consent of the council, enjoy any monopoly, privilege, or preference in respect of the natural resources or the acquisition, development, and operation of the same in any territory placed under its control, influence, or mandate; and the United States further understands that no member of the league shall, without the consent of the council, enjoy any monopoly, privilege, or preference prejudicial to the equal rights and opportunities of any other member in respect of the natural resources or the acquisition, development, or operation of the same situate in any colony, dependency, or sphere of influence, its title or claim to which shall have been vested or confirmed by the treaty or by virtue of the action or authority of the league itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the reservation proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it is not my intention to discuss this reservation. It is merely the purpose of the reservation to prohibit monopoly as to the natural resources of various countries placed under mandatories in pursuance of the authority of the league. Primarily, it is designed to protect the United States in respect to the petroleum resources of the world. That is its purpose, and it has no other object.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations whether this subject has been discussed by the committee, and whether it is not a meritorious reservation.

Mr. LODGE. It has not been before the Committee on Foreign Relations at all, so far as I know.

Mr. PHELAN. I would like to ask the opinion of the Senator on the subject. It is one with which I am very familiar, and I believe it is very meritorious.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, the United States is entirely protected by the clause in the reservation in regard to mandates. No mandate can be taken by the United States, except through action by Congress, and the natural resources of any country of which the United States accepts a mandate come within the control of Congress. This applies entirely to mandates held by other countries.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I so understand. The league is charged with the duty of awarding mandatories. I am under the impression that the league now, as an organized entity, is dealing in mandatories, and the United States not being represented, can not interpose a veto. Am I correct in that?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know whether they are dealing in mandates now or not. I do know that they divided up all the conquered territories long ago.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I think this amendment should prevail for the purpose of protecting the United States in the larger sense. The draft of the league prevents the United States, without the consent of Congress, from taking mandates. But this contemplates mandates given to foreign nations over conquered and other territory, in which the United States is largely interested, because under such mandates countries like England and Japan will take the natural resources, as petroleum, and the United States will be barred from participation in the work of exploitation and development.

I therefore urge the Senate to approve of this reservation, which the Senator in charge of the amendments on the other side seems to find no objection to. It is a matter of protection for the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the reservation proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

Mr. GORE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

On a division, the reservation was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The treaty is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment or reservation. If there be no further amendment and no further reservation to be offered, the treaty will be reported to the Senate.

The treaty was reported to the Senate with the reservations agreed to as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One reservation has been reserved for a separate vote, and if there be no objection the other reservations will be concurred in by the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not wish any record vote, but I do not care to have them adopted by unanimous consent. I have no doubt that they will be concurred in at this time, but I ask that the Chair put a viva voce vote on the other reservations en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the Senator has a right to a vote. The question is, Shall the Senate concur in the reservations which have been agreed upon in Committee of the Whole, with the exception of reservation No. 15?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not care at this moment to discuss the proposition; neither shall I insist upon a vote; but I want to have it understood that I am opposed to some of these reservations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As many as favor the reservations agreed upon in Committee of the Whole, with the exception of reservation No. 15, will say "aye"; contrary "no." The ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it, and the reservations, with the exception of reservation No. 15, are concurred in in the Senate. The question now is on concurring in reservation No. 15.

Mr. LODGE. We are now in the Senate, and I offer a resolution of ratification, the resolving clause, as it is called. I intend to offer to the resolving clause an amendment, and I should like, I think it is in fact necessary, that the reservations adopted in Committee of the Whole and concurred in in the Senate should be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Should not the resolution be read?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. I can not call up at this time the change in it which I propose, because there are reservations to be dealt with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. Let the resolution be read and the modification which I propose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then please have it read as it would read if modified.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It reads:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, subject to the following reservations and understandings, which are hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted by an exchange of notes as a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by at least three of the four principal allied and associated powers, to wit, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan.

To which the Senator from Massachusetts offers the following amendment:

After the word "accepted," on line 9, strike out the following words: "by an exchange of notes as a part and condition of this resolution of ratification by at least three of the four principal allied and associated powers, to wit, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan," and in lieu of those words insert, after the word "accepted," the following:

"As a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by the allied and associated powers, and a failure on the part of the allied and associated powers to make objection to said reservations and understandings prior to the deposit of ratification by the United States shall be taken as a full and final acceptance of such reservations and understandings by said powers."

So that if amended it will read:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, subject to the following reservations and understandings, which are hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted as a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by the allied and associated powers, and a failure on the part of the allied and associated powers to make objection to said reservations and understandings prior to the deposit of ratification by the United States shall be taken as a full and final acceptance of such reservations and understandings by said powers.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I send to the desk and offer as an amendment to the resolving clause the following.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the proposed amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. After the words "United States," in line 7 of the resolving clause, add the following: "unless the instrument of ratification shall have been filed within 60 days after the adoption of the resolution of ratification by the Senate nor," so that it will read:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, subject to the following reservations and understandings, which are hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States unless the instrument of ratification shall have been filed within 60 days after the adoption of the resolution of ratification by the Senate nor until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted—

And so forth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I do not understand from the Senator from Massachusetts that this is proposed, except to be printed and lie on the table, until it is properly in order.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, it will not come up until after the reservations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is upon concurring in reservation number 15.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LODGE. I believe I had the floor, Mr. President. I wanted to say that I should like to have printed with the reservations already adopted the ratifying resolution, showing the amendment proposed by me and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. Of course, I can not take up the ratifying resolution for action and perfecting amendments until after the other reservations are finally disposed of, including any new reservations that may be offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

Mr. LODGE. The reserved reservation that it is proposed to take up is the one that has just been acted on in Committee of the Whole, and it seems to me that it is only reasonable and fair that we should allow it to come up to-morrow before we dispose of the ratifying resolution. My intention was to move that we take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow, and I make that motion.

Mr. ASHURST. Let us stay here and dispose of it to-night.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I had desired to reserve for a separate vote the fourth reservation, and, at the request of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the second reservation. I do not know that any——

Mr. LODGE. They have already been concurred in.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I know. I stepped out for a moment, and it passed into the Senate during that time.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to unanimous consent being given to reconsider.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would like to ask that those be reserved. It may be that nothing will be done.

Mr. LODGE. Without objection, I ask that the vote be reconsidered, and that reservations 2 and 4, as well as reservation 15, be reserved for separate action in the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry. Does it require unanimous consent to enable that to be done?

Mr. LODGE. I have asked unanimous consent to reconsider. Of course, I can move to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for a reconsideration of the vote by which all reservations except No. 15 were concurred in in the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object.

Mr. LODGE. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which they were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to reconsider the vote by which the reservations, aside from No. 15, were concurred in in the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, calling for the yeas and nays does not cut off debate. If the Chair will pardon me, I want to say a word, in the hope that the Senator from Mississippi may be willing not to press for a vote upon the question and thus lead to discussion.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has come in and said there was a reservation concurred in which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] desires to have reserved. He had spoken to me about it, but it escaped my mind. The Senator from Georgia said there was another one which he wished to reserve himself. He was absent and the Senator from North Carolina was absent when the treaty was reported to the Senate. It seems to me merely a matter of courtesy to allow them a separate vote on those reservations, but if it is desired to have the yeas and nays on it, of course we can have them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi demand the yeas and nays?

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand the situation, we will be traveling over old ground again. I think that everybody is tired of it. Let it be settled one way or the other. It may be settled adversely to my own views, but I am not willing to give unanimous consent to anything that continues the debate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. May I inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether in view of the fact that the vote has been reconsidered——

Mr. LODGE. It has not been reconsidered yet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to reconsider is pending.

Mr. LODGE. I asked unanimous consent and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] objected. I now move to reconsider.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Upon that I ask the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the request seconded?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I desire to ask, in order that I may vote intelligently, what is the subject of the two reservations?

Mr. LODGE. Article 10, and domestic questions.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The word "commerce" is the word I have in mind.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to know what is the use of reconsidering the reservation to article 10?

Mr. ASHURST. Oh, to waste a week or two.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to reconsider the vote by which all reservations except No. 15 were concurred in in the Senate.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask that reservations numbered 2 and 4, as well as the last reservation, numbered 15, be reserved for separate votes in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the request of the Senator from Georgia.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] requests that reservations known as reservations 2 and 4 agreed to in Committee of the Whole shall be reserved for separate votes in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is whether the reservations agreed to in Committee of the Whole, with the exception of reservations 2, 4, and 15, shall be concurred in in the Senate.

The reservations were concurred in.

Mr. KELLOGG. Reservations 2, 4, and 15 are reserved?

Mr. LODGE. Yes. The question comes first on reservation 2. Reservation 2 is the one covering article 10, which I trust we shall be able to dispose of without further debate. It has been debated for nearly a year. I shall be glad to let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let us vote to-night.

Mr. LODGE. It was reserved in order to give the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] an opportunity to present his amendment to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He can present it now.

Mr. LODGE. He is not here.

Mr. OVERMAN. My colleague was not well and he went home. He did not think any action was going to be taken on the reservation to-night. I think the Senate owes this courtesy to my colleague, and I hope Senators will not ask for a vote on the reservation to-night.

Mr. REED. Other Senators have made engagements to go away. It seems to me that we can dispose of other matters and the Senator from North Carolina can be communicated with.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I feel that we ought not to require the presence of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] here to-night in view of the fact that he is not well and left on that account, but I see no reason why we should defer the vote on reservation No. 15, so called. I trust we will not recess to-night until we take a vote on that, reserving the vote on Nos. 2 and 4 for to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. As I understand it, under the rule we must take up the reservations in their order, as we take up amendments to a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless the Senate otherwise orders.

Mr. LODGE. Unless the Senate by unanimous consent agrees otherwise.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. On what ground is the contention made that unanimous consent is necessary?

Mr. LODGE. By a vote of the majority, then.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then I move——

Mr. LODGE. I do not see how you are going to set aside——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of so-called reservation No. 15.

Mr. LENROOT. I make the point of order that that is not in order. The reservations must be taken in order and either disposed of or postponed to a day certain, as the Vice President held, as the Senator well remembers, when the treaty first came up.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I have no recollection of that. I see no reason why this should not be done. There was certainly no unanimous consent, so far as I am aware, that the reservations were to be taken up in the order of their number; but if that were the case, we have now agreed by unanimous consent to carry over No. 2 and No. 4 until to-morrow, so that those have temporarily gone over.

Mr. LENROOT. No; we have not yet agreed to that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I hope the Senator will bear in mind that the Senator from Massachusetts secured the consent of the Senate to postpone consideration of article 10 until——

Mr. LENROOT. No; he did not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Until the others have been disposed of.

Mr. LENROOT. I think the Senator made no such request.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the rule referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has reference to proceedings in Committee of the Whole and not when the treaty is in the Senate. Rule 37 reads:

> When a treaty is reported from a committee, with or without amendment, it shall, unless the Senate unanimously otherwise directs, lie one day for consideration, after which it may be read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole, when it shall be proceeded with by articles—> and the amendments reported by the committee shall be first acted upon, after which other amendments may be proposed; and when through with, the proceedings had as in Committee of the Whole shall be reported to the Senate, when the question shall be, if the treaty be amended, Will the Senate concur in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole? And the amendments may be taken separately or in gross, if no Senator shall object; after which new amendments may be proposed.

That is, in Committee of the Whole—

There is nothing in that which says when it comes to the Senate we shall proceed article by article. That applies to proceedings in Committee of the Whole. Consequently when we come to the Senate for the adoption of the amendments proposed in the Committee of the Whole, as I understand it, we proceed as we do in other matters, and it seems to me there ought not to be any objection to considering the reservation. There is nothing that requires unanimous consent by which it should be considered. It seems evident that a majority could move, and, if carried, it would be in order to consider any amendment as it comes up under the general law authorizing the Senate to have control of what it will consider.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, it seems to me this is entirely clear. The rule provides that in the Committee of the Whole amendments shall be considered in their order. The Vice President held, and I think properly held, that in Committee of the Whole amendments could not be passed over except by unanimous consent unless a motion was made to postpone the consideration of those amendments to a day certain. That was debated at some length here in the Senate. After the treaty comes out of the Committee of the Whole and into the Senate, of course, the same rule must prevail because the same reason prevails for the rule.

It is exactly the situation with reference to any bill. If the bill comes out of the Committee of the Whole into the Senate and there have been any amendments adopted, the amendments are taken in their order as a matter of course, unless a motion be made to postpone the consideration of the amendments in their order to a time certain. The Vice President has held that squarely, and it seems to me very plain that the same rule must now prevail. There is one way by which this can be reached. If a motion shall prevail to postpone consideration of all the amendments as they are reached to a time certain, that motion would be in order.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, the rule requires that a treaty in Committee of the Whole shall be considered article by article. The Senator is right when he says the Vice President properly held that when it comes up it must be disposed of in that way in Committee of the Whole. You could dispose of it by voting for or against it, or you could dispose of it by voting to postpone it, but the Senate has absolute control of its business, and when a motion is made to consider a matter it is properly before it except so far as it is precluded by the rules of the Senate.

We are only precluded from making a motion to consider any matter which comes up when the treaty is being considered as in Committee of the Whole. That is the limitation; that is the extent of it. We can not consider the treaty article by article because some articles were adopted without amendment; there is no amendment pending to some articles in the treaty which is now pending in the Senate. If the contention of the Senator is correct, every article of the treaty from the beginning to the end would have to be considered in the order in which they came up in Committee of the Whole, unless unanimous consent were given to pass them over.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, let us see. Whether it be a treaty or a bill when it is reported from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate, what is the pending question? The pending question is the first amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole, and the only way that that question can be gotten rid of is either by adopting or rejecting the amendment or postponing it. That is very clear.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is mistaken in that. Under the rules of the Senate, if a bill is pending here and a motion is made and agreed to to consider another matter, that displaces the bill for immediate consideration; it is not necessary to move that its consideration be postponed. So a motion could be made to take up another matter than the pending treaty. When the time comes, a motion could properly be made to take up one of the amendments, and that would naturally postpone the consideration of the others until the one taken up should have been disposed of.

As I understand, the Senator from Montana moved to proceed to the consideration of reservation No. 15. If that motion is carried, it necessarily postpones the consideration of the other reservations. It is not necessary to displace a bill or other matter by moving to postpone it. All that is necessary is to make a motion to take up another matter, and if the motion is agreed to it naturally postpones the pending matter. It seems to me that if the motion of the Senator from Montana is adopted, it properly postpones the consideration of other reservations.

Mr. LENROOT. I desire to ask the Senator from Virginia, who is a good parliamentarian, if a question is pending before the Senate, a bill or a treaty, how can any motion be in order to take up another amendment until the pending amendment shall have been disposed of?

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, a motion may be made at any time when a bill is pending to take up another bill.

Mr. LENROOT. To take up another measure, and, if agreed to, that displaces the pending measure; but whenever the measure comes back——

Mr. SWANSON. There is nothing in the rule which says that when one amendment is pending a motion may not be made to take up another amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. But that is the general parliamentary rule. The Senator from Virginia must be aware of that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to move to postpone until to-morrow the consideration of reservations 2 and 4?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that that is the very question which is now raised by the point of order.

Mr. LENROOT. It is admitted that a motion to postpone to a day certain would be in order.

Mr. LODGE. And to take up reservation 15.

Mr. LENROOT. That may not be included in the same motion.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate postpone until to-morrow the consideration of reservations 2 and 4.

Mr. ASHURST. If that motion is debatable, I want to be heard.

Mr. LODGE. Pending that motion——

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not wish to say anything unpleasant or to appear to be a disturbing factor, but I will read from the RECORD what occurred last evening when we were confronted by the same situation that is presented here now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair trusts the Senator from Arizona will confine his observations to the point of order.

Mr. ASHURST. If a point of order is pending, it is not debatable, Mr. President, and, of course, I will sit down. I thought a debatable motion had been made, and I wish to be heard. Of course, I am not going to debate a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that there is any motion pending.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I made a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Nebraska restate his motion?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I moved to postpone until to-morrow the consideration of reservations 2 and 4.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. Upon that I wish to be heard. It is a debatable question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, about this hour last night an impasse was reached because the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], whom we all respect and love, had gone home, being ill. It was desired that he might have notice that commencing to-day the Senate would remain in continuous session until we finished all the reservations. The Senator from North Carolina had full notice, and I will read from the RECORD what then occurred.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I can not yield at this time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has plenty of time.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well, I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the limitation as to time related only to the consideration of the matter in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ASHURST. I will read from the RECORD. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], with the assiduity and industry that characterize all his labors, when some of us were pressing for immediate action and urging that Senators stay here and transact the public business, as will be found on page 4462 of the RECORD of March 17, said:

> I thought it was only fair, and I think the Senator will agree with me, that before holding a night session I should give notice of it.
> A polite and gentlemanly thing to do—
> I shall give notice, and I give it now, that to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to remain in session until all reservations, both in the Committee of the Whole and in the Senate, are disposed of.

That was the statement made by my learned friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, it so happens that I have no business elsewhere; I have no engagements elsewhere; but I am authorized to speak for a number of Senators whom I know have sat patiently on these benches whilst speeches were made, reiterating what had been previously said two hundred times on this floor, and some of those Senators have engagements that may not be broken without serious inconvenience to themselves.

Mr. President, every citizen of this country is a stockholder of this Republic; we are the board of directors of this giant corporation—the United States. We ought to be here diligently attending to the business of this corporation—the United States. We, as a board of directors, ought to stay here and do the business of the country; and I hope my learned friend from Massachusetts will stand by the splendid words he used last night when he announced—and all of it went into the RECORD—that we would hold a night session to-night; that he would ask Senators to remain here until all the reservations, both in Committee of the Whole and in the Senate, were disposed of; for it must be obvious to all that, if they are not disposed of to-night, the resolution of ratification can not be voted upon until Saturday. That means serious inconvenience to more than 10 Senators, some of them on one side of the Chamber and some of them on the other.

As to my distinguished friend from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], there is not a man here of whom I think more. I would not be guilty of discourtesy toward him, but he had notice that there would be a night session. The same plea for delay was urged here last night that is now being urged to-night, to wit, that he was absent. So I appeal to Democrats and I appeal to Republicans either to take this treaty with a pair of tongs and throw it into the Potomac River or ratify it, and thus dispose of it one way or the other. The country is tired of hearing anything more about the Senate's discussion of the treaty; the people want the treaty voted up or voted down. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.] It must be obvious to the dullest intellect that the country wants us to proceed to serious domestic questions.

Mr. President, in conclusion, we ought manfully to stay here and finish the reservations, so that on to-morrow we may vote on the resolution of ratification.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Where will you get the tongs?

Mr. ASHURST. I can not furnish them.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. Do I gather from the Senator that his plea is that we hold a night session so that on Friday and Saturday a large number of Senators may be able to absent themselves from the business of the country?

Mr. ASHURST. When the Senator is here for a year or so longer, I should say, he will learn that after Senators have sat here for a year, as many Senators have sat here, and have never been absent at all, they may be pardoned when they go away for a few days upon business that is extremely important to the country and to them.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I am through.

Mr. LODGE. I think I am as anxious as any Senator in this body can be to finish the treaty and finish it as quickly as possible. I will say to the Senator from Arizona that I have not been out of this city since the present Congress assembled, and I have been here every day but one, when I was laid up with a cold; so that I do not think that my record for attendance is bad.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. I said in the beginning of my remarks that the industry and assiduity of the Senator from Massachusetts in attending to public business were beyond the range of praise; they are; he has been here all the time.

Mr. LODGE. I was not looking for a compliment from the Senator because I have stayed here. I do not wish to be unreasonable with other Senators; I am very anxious, if I can, to give those who have important engagements an opportunity to get away, and I should be willing to agree on a time to take a final vote, but we can not do that properly, I think, until the resolution of ratification is dealt with.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would the Senator be willing to agree that we vote to-morrow upon all reservations pending and to be proposed and upon the final question of ratification?

Mr. LODGE. I would be willing to agree to a final vote on the reservations, but I can not agree to a final vote on the resolution of ratification, because I do not know what reservations it is going to carry.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, would the Senator be willing instead of voting on the next calendar day to agree that during the next legislative day we shall continue the session until we have voted upon all reservations proposed and upon the resolution of ratification?

Mr. LODGE. I thought the Senator was trying to fix a certain hour. I should like, if I could, to fix an hour, so that I might assure Senators who wish to go away when they can do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As the Senator said a moment ago, he can not fix an hour——

Mr. LODGE. I can not fix it for the final vote on the resolution of ratification, but that will come immediately as soon as the reservations are disposed of.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator can not fix an hour, I understand, for the simple reason he does not know what may precede the hour.

Mr. LODGE. I do not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the Senator can fix the legislative day, and why not fix to-morrow, and remain in continuous session until we have finished this thing?

Mr. LODGE. We are proceeding in a legislative day now.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the question before the Senate is this: Shall we now adjourn, because the Senator from North Carolina has gone home with full notice of the fact that the Senate would stay in session to-night until the reservations were disposed of? I have the utmost respect for the Senator from North Carolina, but his convenience alone ought not to hold up the Senate when he is in the city. There are a number of Senators here who have made engagements of very great importance to them, and made them upon the assumption that this business would be concluded to-day.

Mr. KING. The Senator means the reservations?

Mr. REED. Yes. The Senator from North Carolina can be reached by telephone and brought here. We were notified that we would conclude this matter to-night, and we have made our plans accordingly. Why not proceed with reservation No. 15 now, and while the discussion, if any, and the vote upon that reservation proceed, the Senator from North Carolina can probably reach here. His purpose in coming here, we are advised, is to offer a substitute for the reservation to article 10. He has offered four or five of them. The question has been exhausted. I would be willing, if it were necessary, to take a recess for an hour in order to give him a chance to get here, but I should like to have reservation 15 voted on. Let us get rid of it, and while we are at it let us get the Senator from North Carolina here. I do not think the Senator from North Carolina ought to adjourn the Senate by going home when he goes with full notice.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that my colleague has gone home unwell. He lives 15 miles in the country, and I do not think it is possible to get him here to-night. I am very sorry that he is not here. I am sure that if he had known this matter was coming up to-night he would have been here.

Mr. REED. Did the Senator hear the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] read the RECORD, in which he repeated the words of the Senator from Massachusetts on yesterday, giving express notice that he would hold the Committee of the Whole and the Senate in session to-night until all reservations had been disposed of?

Mr. OVERMAN. I was not here, and I did not hear it. I know that was said, though. I do not know, however, whether my colleague heard it, or knew of it, or not.

Mr. REED. He ought to have known of it. I have engagements, and other Senators have engagements.

Mr. OVERMAN. He is not well, and he went home. He lives 15 miles out of the city.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska will allow me, it seems to me we might pass over reservation 2, if necessary—I am sorry it has to go over, because if we reopen the debate on article 10 to-morrow there is no knowing when anybody will get away—but the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who has reserved reservation 4, is here, and we might as well dispose of that.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I move that the consideration of reservation 2 be postponed until after the consideration of reservations 4 and 15.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a motion pending, made by the Senator from Nebraska, which must be disposed of before another question is put.

Mr. REED. I move that as a substitute.

Mr. KELLOGG. I make the point of order that that can not be done except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that as I understand the general idea was that to-day we would dispose of all the reservations in the Committee of the Whole and in the Senate, and that to-morrow we would consider the resolution of ratification. Under the rules of the Senate it has to go over one day.

Mr. LODGE. I wanted to complete the matter if I could, but the absence of the Senator from North Carolina makes it impossible to conclude the matter to-night.

Mr. SWANSON. My suggestion was that consequently the understanding last night was that to-morrow the entire treaty would be disposed of.

Mr. LENROOT. There was no such understanding.

Mr. LODGE. There was no understanding of any kind.

Mr. SWANSON. Could we get unanimous consent—it seems to me that there is no rule prohibiting it—to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, and stay in session to-morrow night until the entire treaty is disposed of?

Mr. LODGE. I am not going to make any unanimous-consent agreement to vote on the resolution of ratification until I know what is in it.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator would object to an arrangement to stay in session to-morrow until we had considered all the reservations?

Mr. LODGE. No; I have no objection to any agreement on reservations.

Mr. SWANSON. But to include also the resolution of ratification? Many Senators have made engagements that are important to them. Many of them are candidates for reelection.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senate will dispose of the reserved reservations, so that there can be no more, and the door is closed to any more, then I will make an agreement to vote.

Mr. ASHURST. Let us dispose of them.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator knows practically what the resolution of ratification will be. There is no question about it.

Mr. LODGE. No; I mean the reservations that are going to be incorporated in it.

Mr. SWANSON. I mean the resolution of ratification to give effect to the treaty and the reservations that have been adopted. It seems to me that if we could reach an agreement to-night—which I am satisfied we could do, by unanimous consent—we could meet to-morrow and stay in session to-morrow night until the entire treaty is disposed of, and that would accomplish the purpose for which we are here to-night.

Mr. LODGE. Why should we not go on now and dispose of article 4? The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is here.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to that, but I should like to have an agreement to dispose of the entire matter to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. I will stay here and dispose of them all if it is necessary. We waste so much time in talking about agreements and arguing futile points. Here are the reservations. The Senator who has reserved reservation 4 is here. The Senator who has reserved reservation 15 is here. I am very sorry the Senator from North Carolina is not here, or has not placed his reservation in the hands of some other Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in order to test the sense of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that during the legislative day beginning to-morrow at 12 o'clock the Senate shall consider all pending and all proposed reservations and the question of the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. That would involve taking an adjournment, and losing two hours in the morning. I want to take a recess when we go. I will agree to any reasonable time to vote on reservations, but I will not agree to take the final vote on the resolution of ratification until I know what it is carrying.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to offer my request for unanimous consent—that the Senate, upon the beginning of the legislative day to-morrow, after we recess to-night instead of taking an adjournment, shall take up and dispose during the legislative day of all pending and proposed reservations and the question of ratification.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if we take a recess to-night, it will be the same legislative day to-morrow.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate shall take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock, and that when it reassembles after the recess it shall proceed with the consideration of all pending and proposed reservations and amendments, and shall, during the legislative day which began this morning and will be continued to-morrow, finish the consideration of reservations, amendments, and the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, if he can.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Secretary need not state it. I object to it, so there is no use of his stating it. If Senators want to make the agreement so as to submit these reservations and vote on them to-morrow without debate, I would be willing to consent to it, but not otherwise.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will offer the request, and make it that the vote shall be taken without debate. I will put it that way. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate takes a recess to-night it shall, during the balance of the legislative day which began this morning, consider and decide all pending and proposed reservations and the question of the ratification of the treaty, and that all this shall be done without further debate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, Mr. President, we object to that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to modify the motion I made so that it will read that reservation 2 be postponed until to-morrow for consideration. That will enable us to consider reservation 4, the Senator from Georgia being here, and we can consider that and dispose of it at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska include reservation 15 in that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I move simply to postpone reservation 2 and take up reservation 4 as the next one.

Mr. KELLOGG. Of course the one the Senator from Nebraska wants to vote on to-night is reservation 15. He does not care anything about the rest.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Reservation 4 will come first. Let us take up reservation 4 first. That is in the usual order.

Mr. KELLOGG. Of course, if we would agree to vote on reservation 15, they would postpone the others any length of time. That is what the Senator is driving at.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am taking the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts that we postpone the consideration of reservation 2 until to-morrow on account of the absence of the Senator from North Carolina. We can then go on with the consideration of reservation 4.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move to amend the motion of the Senator from Nebraska by adding reservation No. 15.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think that exposes the situation. The real effort to adjourn is on account of reservation 15, not on account of the absence of anybody.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask for a vote upon my motion.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask for a vote on my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the motion made by the Senator from Nebraska and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the consideration of reservation No. 2 be postponed until after the consideration of reservation No. 4.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to inquire of the Senator from Nebraska if he changed his motion so as to defer the consideration of reservation No. 2 until to-morrow?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I did.

Mr. REED. Let it be stated, then.

Mr. KELLOGG. And I moved to amend by inserting reservation 15.

Mr. FRANCE. On that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota to the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. FRANCE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, may the question that is now being submitted be stated to the Senate? There were two or three, and I could not hear them all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senate would be in order, Senators could hear the question. The Chair will attempt to state it if Senators will be in order.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] moved that the consideration of reservation No. 2 in the Senate be postponed until to-morrow, which motion the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] moved to amend by adding reservation No. 15. So the question now is upon the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer my pair to my colleague, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I am informed that my pair, if present, would vote as I desire to vote upon this motion, and I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). Did the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have a general pair with that Senator, and in his absence I am not at liberty to vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. EDGE. Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Again announcing my pair, in the absence of the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. STANLEY. Not being able to obtain a transfer of my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who has not voted. I am not able to obtain a transfer, and therefore I withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 46, as follows:

So Mr. KELLOGG's amendment to Mr. HITCHCOCK's motion was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. REED. Mr. President, please state the motion again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the consideration of reservation No. 2 be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before we vote on the motion, I want to make a statement to the Senate. I just talked a few minutes ago with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] over the phone, and advised him that the Senate is in session considering these propositions, and that it was likely that article 10 would be disposed of to-night. I told him we could undoubtedly arrange to hold it long enough for him to get here, and asked him if he would come. He replied that he was much obliged for the information, and that he would see. So he has had notice, and he is within reach, and I am not in favor of agreeing to a motion to postpone the consideration of article 10 under those circumstances. We have been over article 10 in every phase than can be conceived of. I do not want to vote on that article until the Senator from North Carolina has had abundant time to reach here. I want to extend him every courtesy. But there are others who ought to be considered, and I am in favor of disposing of these reservations to-night. Then we will have to-morrow to dispose of the general resolution.

It is not necessary to incorporate in this motion that we will postpone the consideration of reservation 2 until to-morrow. All that is necessary to do is to move to postpone it until after the consideration of reservations 4 and 15, and I hope the Senator will change his motion so that that can be done and we can clean up this business to-night while we are here in the humor to do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I move to amend so that the motion will read that reservation 2 be postponed until after the Senate has acted upon reservation 4.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska now moves that action on reservation No. 2 be postponed until the Senate has acted upon reservation No. 4.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon concurring in reservation No. 4.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that the reservation now be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report reservation No. 4.

The reading clerk read as follows:

4. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children and in opium and other dangerous drugs, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the League of Nations, or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). The question is upon concurring in the reservation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I move to strike the word "commerce" from the reservation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On line 15 of the reservation strike out the word "commerce," so that it will read:

Including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, the tariff, the suppression of traffic in women and children,

And so forth.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This reservation is a reservation stating what constitute domestic problems. The object of the reservation is to protect our domestic problems from consideration by the council under article 15 and to prevent the council from having the right to determine, under rules of international law, what subjects are solely domestic.

I am thoroughly in favor of most of the reservation, of all the balance of it. I think it utterly indefensible to leave the covenant as it reads. I am in favor of nullifying the provision in article 15, which places the right to pass on domestic questions in the league, because it ought to be nullified. Article 15 as it reads carries to the council the right to pass upon all problems or disputes except domestic problems, but leaves it also to the council to determine whether a question is or is not a domestic question. They can only cease the consideration of a question which we claim to be domestic if they find under the rules of international law that the question is solely domestic.

I am thoroughly against that provision in the covenant. I am unwilling for any nation or any council or any board of arbitration to pass upon any of our domestic questions and I am equally unwilling for any council to have the right to determine what is or is not a domestic question. I believe the United States, whenever our duly constituted authorities regard a question as domestic, should decide for itself that it is domestic and then refuse to allow any foreign council or foreign organization to overrule our decision and hold a problem that we consider to be domestic to be semi-international.

I do not mind saying that we nullify that part of article 15. We ought to nullify it. I am not frightened by the suggestion that we are nullifying something in this covenant. I would not vote to ratify the treaty unless a number of things in the covenant were nullified. They are dangerous to American rights, and should be stricken, and this is one of them.

The preservation of control, without foreign interference, of our domestic problems is essential, and when by this reservation we take ourselves out from under the rights of this council to determine whether questions are domestic or not, to that extent we nullify the covenant and we ought to nullify the provisions that would give a foreign board the right, over our protest, to decide and pass upon domestic problems pertaining to this country alone.

Mr. President, this reservation covers that question by saying that—the United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children and in opium and other dangerous drugs, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the League of Nations, or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

All of this reservation is right except one word. That is the word "commerce." The reason that is wrong is we can not possibly claim all commercial questions are domestic. The very term "commerce," in its broad sense, implies international exchange and international transactions of trade. When the commerce is domestic we have the privilege of saying so and excluding it from arbitration. When it is international, if we intend to carry out the scheme of adjustment of disputes, we ought not to withdraw it. The first part of the reservation says, broadly, that—the United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction.

So that, without naming commerce, whenever the commercial transaction is a domestic transaction, the United States will so declare and not permit arbitration or consideration by the council. When the United States determines it is an international problem and not a domestic problem, then the United States would say, "We will let it take its course for adjustment, as in other international problems, under the terms of the covenant."

There is no defense for putting the word "commerce" in this reservation. There is not a Senator who does not know that many commercial transactions are international and in no sense domestic, and when we say that all problems of commerce are domestic we can not defend ourselves.

Now, remember, the first part of the reservation gives broadly the right to our Government to determine what is and what is not domestic. We can save from the league council all commercial transactions that are domestic.

But to name all commercial transactions as domestic goes beyond the truth, and if we really want in this reservation to conform to the truth we ought to leave out the word "commerce" and leave it to our Government to withdraw all commercial questions when we regard them as domestic.

I like the use of the word "immigration," because I am in favor of saying, whether the immigration problem could be strictly considered as domestic or not, we do not intend to permit any country to have anything to do with determining who we will allow to come into the United States and live with us and who we will not or who we will allow to stay here and who we will not.

My motion to strike the word "commerce" is simply in the interest of having the reservation carry truthfully the fact that some commercial transactions may be domestic and some international, and that where they are domestic we will so declare and keep them out of the consideration of the council of the league, but where we ourselves determine that they are international we will not withdraw them on the ground that they are domestic.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I appreciate the argument of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], but this is a question that was fully debated in Committee of the Whole and is fully understood. Therefore I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Glass	Lodge	Smoot
Borah	Gronna	McKellar	Spencer
Brandegee	Hale	Moses	Sterling
Capper	Harris	Myers	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Harrison	New	Swanson
Colt	Henderson	Norris	Thomas

Fletcher	Kenyon	Robinson	Watson
France	Keyes	Sheppard	Wolcott
Frelinghuysen	King	Shields
Gay	Kirby	Smith, Ga.
Gerry	La Follette	Smith, S. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

The Senator from Georgia asks for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to lay the amendment on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence I am compelled to withhold my vote.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as previously, concerning my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his named was called). In the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. COMER] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HENDERSON. Making the same announcement as before relative to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair to the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (after having voted in the negative). I desire to inquire whether the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I withdraw my vote, as I have a general pair with that Senator.

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 33, as follows:

YEAS—40.

Ball	Elkins	Keyes	Reed
Borah	Fernald	La Follette	Smoot
Brandegee	France	Lenroot	Spencer
Calder	Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Sterling

So the motion to lay on the table the amendment of Mr. SMITH of Georgia was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the reservation No. 4, which was adopted as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The reservation made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. According to the recollection of the Chair, the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] was that reservation No. 2 be postponed until after reservation No. 4 had been disposed of. Therefore, according to the understanding of the Chair, reservation No. 2 is the next reservation to be considered.

Mr. REED. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I had a message from the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] a few moments ago calling me to the telephone to speak to him, but I was then in the midst of the effort to strike out the word "commerce" from the fourth reservation. I therefore could not leave. It seemed to me I was doing such valuable service by removing that objectionable word from the fourth reservation that I should remain and attend to it. So I do not know what it was the Senator from North Carolina desired to say. If the Senate is going to proceed now to the consideration of reservation No. 2, I wish to offer a substitute for it that I understand the Senator from North Carolina would offer if he were here.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Did I understand the Chair to announce that the question before the Senate at this time was whether the Senate should take up for consideration reservation No. 2 or reservation No. 4? What is before the Senate at the present time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not make such an announcement. The Chair announced that his understanding was that the question before the Senate was on concurring in reservation No. 2, reservation No. 4 having been disposed of in accordance with the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

The Secretary will now state the reservation presented by the Senator from Georgia on behalf of the Senator from North Carolina in the nature of a substitute for reservation No. 2.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

The United States agrees to use its friendly offices, when requested so to do, under the provisions of article 10, in assisting to procure a just and peaceful settlement of territorial or political controversies between nations or to protect any member of the league from external aggression; but it does not assume any obligation to use its military or naval forces or its financial or economic resources for the purpose of intervention in the controversies or conflicts between nations or to protect the territorial integrity or political independence of any nation under the provisions of article 10, unless in any particular case the Congress, in the exercise of full liberty of action and in the light of full information as to the national justice and human rights involved, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have received a message that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] left his home 15 minutes ago and is now on his way here. Of course, I could take up 15 minutes under the rule in talking about the reservation, and by that time he would be here.

Mr. LODGE. I certainly do not want to force the consideration of reservation No. 2 now, if the Senator from North Carolina is on his way here.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we may proceed now to the consideration of reservation No. 15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. REED. Reservation 15 is the other one that is pending, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I offer a substitute for the reservation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York offers a substitute for reservation 15, which will be stated.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

In consenting to the ratification of the treaty with Germany the United States adheres to the resolution of sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice adopted by the Senate June 6, 1919, and declares that when self-government is attained by Ireland, a consummation it is hoped is at hand, it should promptly be admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, this is identical with the original reservation offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], excepting that on lines 2 and 3 the language "to the principle of self-determination and" is stricken out.

I ask for a vote on the substitute.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it is very evident that the reservation adopted in Committee of the Whole will be readopted in the Senate. The comments made upon that reservation this afternoon by the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] meet with my hearty approval. The Senate of the United States is exercising its constitutional prerogative of passing upon a great State paper—a proposed treaty between itself and all the leading and many of the minor nations of the world. I have had occasion heretofore to speak of the supreme importance which that attribute of senatorial authority occupies as compared with its general routine duties, and I have at all times deprecated the intrusion of partisan politics into the exercise of the treaty-making power or into its determination to ratify or to reject a given instrument.

I had hoped until to-day that the final disposition of this treaty by the Senate would be upon its merits, without regard to petty political considerations. I call them so because it plainly appears from the proceedings of to-day that the purpose sought to be accomplished by many of those who support this reservation is to secure, if possible, some political advantage in the next presidential election. Others have supported it because they feel convinced that its addition to these reservations means the rejection of the treaty, and still others because they have been unable to secure a vote of unconditional ratification. These motives do not commend themselves to the judgment of candid men.

Mr. President, the conduct of the Senate, not on this occasion alone but upon others in the exercise of its treaty-making power, has been criticized and the wisdom of the framers of the Constitution in endowing the Senate with this power has been condemned. If anything were needed to justify that criticism and to approve that condemnation, it is supplied by the record of the Senate of the United States on the 18th day of March, 1920, a record as humiliating as it was unexpected.

I offered this morning an amendment to this reservation including the people of Korea in our general expression of sympathy and of hope, not because I approved of it, but because I could not consent to the application of the so-called principle to a single nation. It was voted down; and yet some of the Senators who voted against that amendment supported and will support the reservation when it was shorn of the amendment. I am unable to comprehend any system of reasoning which attempts to reconcile these positions. It is impossible. When, in addition to that, we reflect that this proposed reservation could command a majority vote of the Senate only when shorn of every other consideration except that relating to the people of Ireland, the conclusion is inevitable that the sole purpose of its introduction and of its adoption is to make political capital for the approaching presidential election. That is a sad commentary upon the wisdom of the Senate and as well of open executive session. I trust this is the last one which the Senate will ever hold for the consideration of a treaty, however unimportant the document.

Because the galleries have been crowded, we have frequently taken occasion, in the discussion of this treaty to indulge in vehement and offensive language against every great power in the world, and to express our contempt for most of the smaller ones. I do not recall a country which has escaped some criticism during these discussions. This is deplorable. We have been talking to the galleries, and have justified in large degree criticisms of the wisdom of that provision of the Constiution which divides the treaty-making power between the executive and the Senate. If any Member of this body still holds the opinion that open executive sessions are wise, or even politic, I trust the spectacle which the Senate of the United States has to-day presented to the people of the United States will serve to disillusion him. And if anyone longer imagines that any issue submitted to this body for determination, however great, will escape the contamination of a sordid and humiliating partisanship, let him read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in the morning and be undeceived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] to reservation 15.

Mr. FERNALD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gay	Lodge	Smith, Md.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, for the purpose of limiting further discussion on the subject, I move to lay the substitute of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado moves to lay on the table the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may the question be stated so that some of us who have been out of the Chamber may know what the question is?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending question.

The READING CLERK. The substitute offered by the Senator from New York reads as follows:

In consenting to ratification of the treaty with Germany the United States adheres to the resolution of sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice, adopted by the Senate June 6, 1919, and declares that when self-government is attained by Ireland, a consummation, it is hoped, is at hand, it should promptly be admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

Mr. REED. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. There was a motion made to lay that on the table, was there not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was.

Mr. REED. If that is carried, will it carry the original proposition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not so understand. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], but he releases me on reservation 15. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair and transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I am informed that my pair, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], if present, would vote in favor of this motion. I am therefore at liberty to vote and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. COMER] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. STANLEY. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 51, nays 30, as follows:

So Mr. CALDER'S substitute was laid on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon the adoption of the reservation.

Mr. STERLING. I offer the following amendment to the reservation: In lines 6 and 7 of the reservation I move to strike out the words "a consummation it is hoped is at hand."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On lines 6 and 7 strike out the words "a consummation it is hoped is at hand" and the comma.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. Just a word in regard to this amendment. The whole reservation, of course, is a strange thing in connection with anything contained in the treaty or in the covenant. It is absolutely foreign to any provision, to any stipulation, or to any agreement of the treaty or the covenant. But this particular language, Mr. President, expresses the hope that self-government for Ireland will speedily be attained. To whom is the hope addressed? If it is to Great Britain it will not hasten proceedings in Britain by a day. British statesmen will consider this question and consider it in the interests of England and Ireland together, and looking to the best interests of all the people.

Is this meant as a recognition of the new Irish republic, of which Mr. de Valera is the president, self-constituted, or chosen without any lawful or constitutional authority for his assuming that position? Is that the idea? What is to be accomplished by language of this kind put in this amendment, "a consummation it is hoped is at hand"?

Mr. President and Senators, I sympathize with what has been said here from time to time in regard to the motives that have influenced some Senators in their votes upon this particular reservation and in their attitude in regard to it. Senators have occupied absolutely inconsistent positions, first declaiming against a treaty and a covenant that would lead us to interfere with the affairs of other nations, and yet insisting with all their eloquence and all their power that we must here pass a reservation of this kind.

Of course, the belief must be that this will be unacceptable to somebody in the end and will lead to a defeat of the treaty and the covenant.

In regard to others it has been intimated that they are influenced by the effect it may have in certain States of the Union. I think both are, if I may say so, entirely unworthy motives. I had hoped that the treaty and covenant would be ratified with reseravtions, of course, that would Americanize it, that would protect America's vital interests. Those reservations we have adopted in Committee of the Whole. Now, here in the last hours of the discussion is an attempt, connived at, I think, by the leader upon the other side, for the purpose of defeating the treaty, Americanized as it is.

It will not do to say at this late day that the treay with these reservations will be unacceptable to the Allies. Great Britain, France, and Italy will gladly welcome us into this League of Nations, not that we shall participate in everything as we might be required under some of the articles with regard to which we have passed strong reservations, but that they may have the great moral weight of America's influence in an effort to promote the peace of the world. It seems to me that ought to be the spirit that should actuate us now rather than the motives which I have mentioned and which are unworthy such a cause.

This reservation, Senators, I think, presents another barrier to the ratification of the treaty and I believe it should be defeated, but if adopted it should be with the words I have named stricken out.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota on the table.

Mr. STERLING. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as made when I last voted—and this announcement I desire to stand with reference to reservation 15—I vote "yea."

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Being at liberty to vote on this motion, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I am unable to obtain a transfer of my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 70, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS—70.

Ashurst	Gerry	McCormick	Shields
Ball	Glass	McKellar	Simmons

So Mr. STERLING'S amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I was one among those upon this side of the Chamber who supported the reservation providing that the other members of the league shall not interfere with the internal and domestic affairs of our country. I believed in that policy and therefore supported the reservation carrying out the idea. I find, however, quite a few of my fellow Senators who did not think it was necessary for this country to make it plain that we were going to preserve our rights and control over our domestic problems, who are now voting to interfere in the affairs of another nation, who are proposing to settle here in a treaty a question which has nothing to do with the treaty and should not be injected into the covenant of the League of Nations. It is peculiarly a political question. You can take it in Ireland, or you can take it in England, but a political question is a political question there just as it is here in America.

I do not think that this is the place to settle the Irish question. Therefore I have opposed this reservation. Just think of the consistency of a great many in having tried to settle the Irish question in this way, who voted against settling the question in Egypt, the question in Korea, and other nations. They did not think we should have anything to do with those. I have supported the League of Nations; I have been sincerely hopeful that those who claim they were the friends of the treaty would not so cripple the broad, commendable purpose so as to make it of no avail whatever. Even some of them say now that the reservations which have been adopted defeat the main purpose and object of the league. I suppose they want to put on another reservation to help make more pronounced the defeat of the treaty. I am surprised to see those who claim to be the friends of the League of Nations forcing this Irish question at this time. Do they want to befriend the Irish or is it their purpose to kill the treaty?

In my opinion those who think that for us to defeat this reservation would be of any particular discouragement to Ireland are very much mistaken in that conclusion. I think that we should defeat it, and that we should make it plain we do not propose to have brought in here merely for political purposes something that is not relevant; that has nothing whatever to do with the question under consideration. I have always thought that the best way to avoid the possibility of defeat on a proposition that was irrelevant was to let it alone.

Who was it that brought in for consideration the question of Ireland and her independence? It was those who wanted the United States to try to influence England in agreeing to Ireland's independence. I do not propose to discuss the question of Ireland's independence one way or the other; I think the people over there are more capable of determining the question for themselves; they are more familiar with it than we on this side of the ocean can possibly be. I hope the reservation will be defeated.

Although I did not support all of the reservations which have been adopted to the treaty, in my anxiety to have the great purposes and objects that are promulgated in the League of Nations given a trial, I have hoped that the situation would be such that I could support the resolution of ratification even with the reservations, some of which I opposed; but I submit, Mr. President, if we go on putting on additional reservations, reservations upon subjects that have nothing to do with it, we shall lessen the possibility of the League of Nations ever becoming effective. The great work done by our great President will be lost.

I appeal to those who claim that they are friends of the idea of disarmament, that they are friends of the idea of world peace, who are supposed to want to have the treaty and the League of Nations covenant left in such form that it will meet the Executive approval, not to keep on making it more difficult for us to adopt the covenant of the League of Nations and the treaty. A great many of the Senators gave as an excuse for their opposition to reservations that we should not adopt certain reservations because they would not meet Executive approval, not because they particularly disapproved of them themselves. There are a number of Senators on the floor who do not particularly disapprove of certain reservations, yet they do not want them adopted because they fear they will not meet the Executive approval. Do they think that this will meet the Executive approval, Mr. President? Do they think that they are doing something that will meet with the Executive commendation in taking up and trying to settle the Irish question? Do they not think that the Executive might have done that himself if he had thought it was proper in the preparation of the League of Nations and in framing the treaty?

My position is, regardless of the merits, one way or the other, as to whether Ireland should have her freedom, regardless of the contentions that are made, pro and con, by one element in Ireland and another contention that is made by another element that we have not anything to do with this foreign question, and that this is no place for us to try to settle the Irish issue. As a matter of fact, I do not think the Senate is the proper place to settle it, even if we were not trying to tack it on to the League of Nations, because I think we should accord to the other nations the same rights which we claim for ourselves.

We should at least be a little consistent. We have declared that we would not permit others to interfere with our internal or domestic affairs. It would be about as much of an affront, I should think, to Great Britain for us to try to settle the Irish question for them as it would to the United States if Great Britain should endeavor to settle the Philippine question for us. If she attempted to do that, there would be Senator after Senator who would stand on this floor and condemn Great Britain for her interference. I say, Mr. President, we should at least be consistent in dealing with these questions. We have said to the other nations, "When it comes to our domestic problems, we warn you now that you must 'keep off the grass.'" Let us pursue the same course in dealing with them and practice what we preach.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. If the Senate is ready to vote, I will not delay it a minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon concurring in reservation No. 15. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. COMER] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I am unable to obtain a transfer of my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 38, as follows:

So reservation No. 15 was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon agreeing to reservation No. 2.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have offered the substitute which was offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] near the close of the discussion upon this subject at the time that reservation No. 2 was adopted by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate only a few moments in what I have to say with reference to this substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. I discussed this substitute at some length when this matter was in the Committee of the Whole. I do not think it necessary to detain the Senate long in this second presentation.

I am induced to present it a second time, because, if it shall fail of adoption, as I assume it will, I shall have laid the foundation for some amendments which I intend to offer to the substitute of the Senator from Massachusetts later, in case it shall fail of adoption; and I can just as well discuss those amendments in connection with this substitute as discuss them when I offer them separately.

Mr. President, I am afraid that Senators did not fully appreciate some of the provisions of this substitute at the time of the former vote. It was then sought on the part of Senators representing the majority to show that this substitute did not materially differ from the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. I think it very fundamentally differs from the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, but does not differ in such a way that the majority in this body can logically refrain from giving their support to it by reason of that difference.

The substitute of the Senator from Massachusetts embraces two separate and distinct propositions. The first part of that substitute declares that the United States assumes no obligation to preserve by the use of its Army, its resources, and the boycott, the territorial integrity and political independence of other nations. The second proposition in that substitute provides that the United States shall not interfere in any way in controversies between nations, including controversies relating to territorial integrity and political independence. It does not provide in the latter case that it shall not interfere by the use of its Army and its Navy and its resources, as it does in the first portion of the reservation, but it provides that in the second case it shall not interfere in any way whatsoever with controversies between other nations. It is therefore perfectly manifest that the second part of the reservation of the Senator from Massachusetts, in effect, nullifies the qualification contained in the first part of that reservation. So that the first part of the substitute of the Senator from Massachusetts is, in effect, nugatory, and his proposition stands before the Senate a bare, naked proposition that the United States shall not in any case interfere in controversies between nations, including those with reference to territorial integrity and political independence, unless Congress acts and so provides.

That is the character of the Senator's reservation. By accepting the amendment which he injected at the instance of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], whose purpose throughout this debate has been to defeat this treaty, he has destroyed the first part of his substitute and made it innocuous and inactive and ineffective; and while his amendment is held up here as a proposition that we shall not interfere by the use of the Army and Navy, by the juggling of words suggested by the ingenuity of the Senator from Idaho and yielded to by the Senator from Massachusetts in this case, as in every case where that Senator has objected to anything that the Senator from Massachusetts proposed or wanted to do, he has destroyed that part of his reservation.

Now, Mr. President, my proposition is—and that is the fundamental difference between it and the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts—that both as to interference with controversies growing out of questions relating to territorial integrity and political independence, and as to controversies of any other character between nations, the provision shall be that we shall not interfere with our Army or with our Navy in either case. If the Senator from Massachusetts and his colleagues upon the other side of the Chamber are willing to stand by the proposition that the United States shall not assist in preserving the territorial integrity and political independence of members of the league by the use of its Army and its Navy, why do they object in the case of interference in other controversies to the qualification as to the use of our Army and Navy without the consent of Congress? Why should they object to placing that qualification on both propositions?

Why do they object to the same qualification as to controversies relating to political independence and territorial integrity and general interference including in the language "territorial integrity and political independence"? Is there any reason why that qualification should be placed upon its interference in the one case and not placed upon its interference in the other case?

I say not. If the Senator from Massachusetts will change his amendment in that particular, and provide that we shall not assume an obligation to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of members of the league by the use of our Army and Navy without the consent of Congress, and then add that we shall not interfere by the use of our Army and Navy, and so forth, in controversies between other nations, including those relating to territorial integrity and political independence, his reservation will appeal much more strongly to me, and I think it will appeal very much more strongly to other Senators on this side of the Chamber. I think if the Senator will change his reservation so as to place this qualification upon both classes of controversies, it will very largely tend to remove the objections which it is said are entertained against his substitute at the other end of the Avenue.

Of course, I do not undertake to say that it would entirely remove those objections, but I do believe that the chief trouble at the other end of the Avenue with reference to agreeing to this reservation arises out of the fact that it contains the broad proposition that this Government shall not interfere in any way whatsoever with controversies between other nations unless Congress so provides. I believe that if this is qualified with the language of the first part of the Lodge reservation, so as to provide that it shall not interfere in these controversies by the use of its Army and Navy, and so forth, that objection will be very largely removed.

Mr. President, I do not mean to be understood as contending that this provision of the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts abrogates the great national policy known as the Monroe doctrine, but I do undertake to say that in its present form it may be, to say the very least, an embarrassment in connection with the enforcement of that great national policy which the Senators on the other side of this Chamber have, with ringing eloquence, declared and reiterated was an inviolate policy of the United States. Controversies may arise under the Monroe doctrine which are embraced under article 10, and an assault by Great Britain or by Spain or by Germany upon any of the Republics to the south of us in their efforts at colonization or in their efforts at conquest would constitute an external aggression such as is contemplated in article 10.

Yet, Mr. President, under the spirit and the letter of this reservation the United States might find itself somewhat embarrassed, at least, in a speedy effort to relieve those countries against the pressure that might be brought to bear upon them. According to the language of the reservation we assume no obligation to interfere in any way in controversies between nations under article 10 unless Congress shall so declare. Mr. President, I do not know how far it might interfere with that great doctrine, but I can see some danger in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina has just stated that the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] accepted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] destroyed this reservation, and that it was a surrender to the bitter enders.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said it nullified the first part of it. I did not say "surrender."

Mr. LENROOT. But, Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] last Monday moved to strike that language out of the reservation and gave as his reason that it was merely a repetition; that it was all covered by the language of the Senator from Idaho. This is what he said:

> I move to strike from the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts the following words, found in lines 6 and 7 of the printed copy thereof, namely, "including all controversies relating to territorial integrity or political independence." This is, to my mind, simply absurd tautology, and I must confess some surprise that such a master of English as the Senator from Massachusetts should have the thought of marring the reservation tendered by him by the introduction of this language. The original draft read:
> "The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country by the employment of its military or naval forces, its resources, or any form of economic discrimination, or to interfere in any way in controversies between nations."
> The reservation provided that the United States would not interfere in controversies between nations, and there is no limitation on the controversies at all—all the controversies; any controversy.

And the Senator from Montana therefore moved to strike that language out as being merely repetition; and now the Senator from North Carolina says that this was a vital amendment, a surrender to the bitter enders.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, of course I know the Senator from Wisconsin does not desire purposely to misrepresent me; but my contention was that the language of the second part of the reservation practically eliminated that part of the first which relates to the use of the Army and the Navy.

Mr. LENROOT. I understand that. But the Senator did say that the acceptance by the Senator from Massachusetts of the amendment of the Senator from Idaho was a surrender of the position he had occupied.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think so yet.

Mr. LENROOT. And yet the Senator from Montana stated that there was no difference at all, that it added nothing to it, but was mere repetition; and it was mere repetition, Mr. President.

Now that we are at the last reservation, perhaps it is opportune to say that this reservation was accepted to save the faces of the bitter enders. They saw the untenable position they were in. They saw they could not make out a case of obligation under the substitute reservation, and they saw that every time they made an assault upon it, unsuccessful in getting Republican votes, they were aiding in ratifying the treaty by giving you gentlemen on the other side of the aisle an excuse to vote for ratification. So they wanted to save their faces, and the Senator from Idaho suggested that amendment in order to do so. We were perfectly willing to have the bitter enders save their faces, just as we are perfectly willing to have Senators on the other side of the aisle save their faces if they desire to do so.

Now, I want to ask the Senator from North Carolina, aside from the obligation to use our good offices, what is the difference in obligation between the substitute which he now proposes and the reservation as it stands?

Mr. SIMMONS. The difference in obligation does not exist. It is a difference in the qualification to the obligation.

Mr. LENROOT. How can there be a difference in qualification of the obligation if the obligation does not exist?

Mr. SIMMONS. I qualify the second obligation, which is that we will not interfere in controversies between other nations. I qualify that, just as you qualify the first by saying that we will not interfere with the Army, the Navy, and so on.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, may I ask the Senator, what obligation remains under his reservation that does not remain under the pending reservation?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not pretend to say, and have not argued that the obligation was different, except as to carrying out the obligation in the one case by the Army and not in the other.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator does not mean to say that under either of the reservations as they stand there is any obligation to employ the Army?

Mr. SIMMONS. Neither of these amendments does more than to say that the United States does not assume an obligation. The Lodge reservation says it does not assume an obligation to use the Army and Navy for one purpose, but when it gets to another purpose it leaves out that qualification as to the Army and the Navy.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but what is the effect of leaving out the qualification, in the Senator's mind?

Mr. SIMMONS. The effect is very great. If there is any other way by which this obligation could be enforced except by the Army and Navy, it would still exist.

Mr. LENROOT. Can the Senator think of any other way?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I can think of several other ways; for instance, diplomatic interference.

Mr. LENROOT. I said "good offices." The Senator already has enumerated that.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is in my reservation.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, the Senator does not think there is any difference in the two except the obligation to use good offices?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think there is a difference. I have insisted, and all the minority members of the bipartisan conference insisted, during the whole conference, that the obligation should be qualified and limited to the use of the Army and Navy and the economic boycott, so far as they apply in this case. As to the preservation of the territorial integrity, I am contending only for the same principle that was contended for in the bipartisan conference, with reference to territorial disputes, and as to any other character of dispute.

Mr. LENROOT. As to that principle, of course, the Senator contended in the bipartisan conference that all obligations should be left upon Congress instead of upon the United States, as recommended.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I know the Senate is as impatient as I am to have a vote upon this reservation. It is a reservation which, if reopened, would lead to endless debate, and unquestionably to the defeat of the treaty.

I only want to say that there is one very great distinction between these two reservations to which the Senator from North Carolina did not call attention, unless I failed to hear him. Senators will observe that in the reservation adopted by the Senate it says:

> The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10—

And then comes the language—> or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose.

Those words are omitted from the Senator's reservation. That is an absolutely vital change.

Mr. President, I do not want to be disrespectful, but I think all Senators desire to bring this to an end. I think they are very material differences, and I am going to move to lay the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina on the table.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just a moment before he does that?

Mr. LODGE. Very well; I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has referred to the reason why the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho was accepted. I only desire to say that, when this contest is over and the history of it is written, I will leave it to the judgment of the future to determine who have saved their faces and who have not.

Mr. LODGE. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] moves to lay the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] on the table.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. FERNALD. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and vote "yea."

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]; and

The Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN].

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 34, as follows:

So Mr. SIMMONS's amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to offer a further amendment. I move to strike out, in line 5, the words "in any way" and insert, in line 7, after the word "independence," the words "by the employment of its military or naval forces, its resources, or any form of economic boycott."

Mr. LODGE. I understand those amendments perfectly. They seem to me quite destructive of the purposes of the reservation, and if the Senator has no objection and does not desire to argue them at length I move to lay them on the table.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate in the discussion of the amendments I have offered further than to say that I am honestly and sincerely desirous of securing such a change in this vital reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts as would justify me in voting finally in favor of the resolution of ratification.

I can not, as I now see it, vote for that resolution if the substitute of the Senator from Massachusetts remains unchanged, because I think the substitute of the Senator is nothing more than that we shall not interfere in any controversy whatever in any way whatsoever, even by the exercise of our good offices, unless the Congress shall first so provide. I think that is going a little too far. I would appeal to the Senator to consent to this amendment, so as to put both propositions in the reservation, as it would go very far toward removing my objection to the substitute as it now stands. I would then very seriously consider whether I would vote for the resolution of ratification.

Of course, I know that my appeal to the Senator will fall upon deaf ears. I have appealed to him repeatedly during these long-drawn-out negotiations. A persistent effort has been made on the part of the friends over here to get together with the friends of the treaty on the other side. I have appealed to him to put this reservation in such a form that we could conscientiously vote for it. Twice I have supposed that we had just about reached a point where the Senator would consent to that sort of a change, when he was interfered with by the irreconcilables on the other side of the Chamber and at once he lost his courage and receded from his former position.

I had hoped that before we came to a final vote there would be a change of the anomalous situation which exists on the other side of the Chamber, a situation which I do not believe ever existed in a legislative body before, a situation in which the friends of a measure can not vote as they would like to vote because the enemies of that measure will not permit them to vote for the measure. It is a strange tying of the hands of the majority on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have only a few minutes. The Senator from Massachusetts is practically giving me his time and I am taking advantage of it.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the Senator if there would not be votes enough on the other side of the Chamber to ratify the treaty if President Wilson would permit it?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I do not think this side of the Chamber allows President Wilson to control its conscience. I do not think it allows President Wilson to control its action as much as the Senators on the other side who are in favor of the treaty allow those who are opposed to it to control their consciences and their votes.

Twice we could have compromised this matter, in my judgment, and twice the friends of the treaty on the other side of the Chamber were ready to get together with the friends on this side of the Chamber, when, by reason of an iron-bound agreement of some sort, which they solemnly entered into at the very inception of this controversy, they found themselves in such position that they could not vote their own convictions unless they got the consent of Senators who disagreed with them fundamentally and in every particular.

It is a case, as has been repeatedly stated in the newspapers of the country and as is known to every Senator here, where more than two-thirds of this body are eager and anxious to ratify the treaty, assuming that those who claim to be mild reservationists on the other side are earnest and sincere, and I do not question that. More than two-thirds of this body stand here ready and anxious to ratify the treaty, and yet the majority on the other side of the Chamber are gagged and bound hand and foot by a contract that they made with Senators whose whole purpose and object is to kill the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask if all this comes out of my time? [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMMONS. I appeal to Senators on the other side again, as I appealed the other day, and I am deeply in earnest about this matter. I will make many concessions in order to get myself in a position where I can vote for the ratification of the treaty. I think it would be a crime against civilization and against humanity not to ratify it, and I would vote for it if there were any chance for me to do so consistently with my judgment and conscience.

I appeal to the friends of the treaty upon the other side to forcibly break loose from this "body of death" and meet us halfway and let us join hands, and, shoulder to shoulder, let us do this great work for humanity. An unholy alliance from the foundation of society on this earth has never amalgamated with purity.

Mr. BORAH. Does that term apply to the irreconcilables?

Mr. SIMMONS. I leave that to the Senator's own interpretation. But here we have a great fundamental, world-wide propositon, and we find the friends and the enemies of that proposition on the other side of the Chamber in close coalition, neither being able to do anything to which the other does not agree. That is a conspiracy of death; and yet those Senators taunt us with the assertion that we are here bound hand and foot by the edict of the President, when in the face of the world they stand here, each one of them who claims to be a friend of the treaty, bound hand and foot to the enemies of the treaty. That is the situation which, were it not so tragic, would be very absurd and ridiculous.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I know that the Senator from North Carolina has been thoroughly sincere in all his efforts; that I have never questioned for a moment, nor do I inquire into the motives of anyone; but let me correct him on one or two points.

There has been no conspiracy on this side from the beginning. If there had been, it would have saved one Member on this side a great deal of trouble. We have been endeavoring to act together. Those Senators who are "irreconcilables," numbering 15 or 16, are among the ablest Senators of this body, men of deep convictions on this subject, and they have exercised the influence which their numbers, their ability, and their character entitled them to wield in our councils—that and no more.

Mr. President, we can not conduct matters on this side in the way they are conducted on the other side, for we have no one to write us letters, no one to pen the word "unacceptable" across the reservations as they come up.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is not necessary that letters should be written. The Senator from Idaho has only to tell you what to do and what not to do.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Idaho, I have no doubt, appreciates the compliment and knows just how much it is worth.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to say to the Senator from North Carolina that he ought not so seriously to attack the Senator from Idaho when he is standing shoulder to shoulder with the President to assist him in every way he can to defeat the treaty.

Mr. SIMMONS. If any such alliance has been made, certainly I shall not assist in carrying it out.

Mr. BORAH. There is just exactly the kind of an alliance, based only on a common aim, though, of course, for different reasons; and there is just as much of an understanding between the President of the United States and myself as there is between the Senator from Massachusetts and myself in regard to the treaty.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, I want to say to the Senator from Idaho that one of the great reasons why I am so anxious to vote for the resolution of ratification is that I do not wish to be allied with the "irreconcilables" in my vote on the treaty.

Mr. BORAH. I do not share with the Senator in that view. I am willing to vote with any patriot in so righteous a cause.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am extremely glad to cooperate with Democrats or irreconcilables or other Republicans on this side, with any good men, who will use their votes and their influence to prevent the imposition of this league, unprotected, upon the United States. That would be a disaster to the country, a betrayal of its future, and the longer this treaty is contemplated the worse the prospect seems.

Mr. President, we have gone as far as we possibly could. I said that we would not stand out on the President's position of not crossing a "t" or dotting an "i"; I said we would be ready to consider modifications; that we could not yield principles; but that we would not defeat the treaty on mere phraseology. We have pursued that course; we have reached the limit. I am sorry we have come to the parting of the ways with my friend from North Carolina, but the parting of the ways has come; and if Senators on the other side can not supply the necessary votes to ratify the treaty as it now stands, with the reservations as they now stand, let them beat it, and on their heads be its fate. We will take it to the tribunal of the American people, and we do not fear to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. LODGE. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore in regard to the transfer of my pair to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY], I vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement I made on the previous vote as to my pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. COMER], and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I am unable to obtain a transfer of my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is absent, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]; and

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS—44.

Ball.	Fernald	Keyes	Reed
Borah	France	La Follette	Shields

So Mr. SIMMONS's amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move to amend the reservation by striking out, beginning with the first of line 5 down to the words "or not," in line 8, so that the reservation will read:

> The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of any other country by the employment of its military or naval forces, its resources, or any form of economic discrimination under the provisions of article 10—

And so forth.

Mr. President, let us see what the words are that I have moved to strike out. Frankly, I think them of no importance; I do not regard them as of serious consequence in connection with the reservation; but there are Senators upon this side of the Chamber who do. I understand that the "battalion of death" regard them as important; but their support we can never get, and therefore gratifying them is no step toward the ratification of the treaty.

I wish to state why I think these words are of no importance. First, the words are:

Or to interfere in any way in controversies between nations, including all controversies relating to territorial integrity or political independence, whether members of the league or not.

I believe that nothing is left under the language preceding these words but moral influence, moral interference, moral suasion; that what is included covers all force, all money, all economic pressure.

There is nothing left that could be done except the use of our good offices to help adjust differences and prevent war. Without any obligation under article 10, I regard that as the obligation of every civilized nation—to use its influence wherever possible to dissuade disputants, to dissuade nations on the point of engaging in war from doing so; and without article 10 I believe that obligation does rest upon the United States, and, growing out of other provisions of the league covenant, I think it rests upon it; and declaring in this reservation that we will not, under article 10, assume this responsibility is really amounting practically to nothing.

I do not mind its being there, because I do not consider that it relieves the United States in any way under the balance of the treaty, wherever it can, of the obligation to interpose its good offices in the interests of peace. I think the loss of it under article 10 is immaterial, so I think the presence of it is immaterial. It will get you no votes from the "battalion of death" on the other side to keep those words in the reservation, while it may bring a number of votes to ratification on this side if the words are left out.

It is for that reason that I make the motion, and I press the proposition that it is not of real importance to those who are determined that this league shall not place obligations upon the United States of a character that involves our armies, our navies, our finances, or otherwise, except where Congress in the free exercise of its judgment upon each particular occasion as it arises determines that it is wise and proper for the United States to intervene.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am sorry I can not agree with my friend the Senator from Georgia, but I regard the lines which he proposes to take out as full of meaning and very important; and as he says he does not mind them himself, because he does not think they add anything, I will say that I think they mean a great deal, and I should mind very much having them stricken out. In fact, I am certain that the proposal could not receive support from this side, at least; and I move to lay it on the table.

Mr. REED. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to lay on the table the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia. On that question the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement that I made a while ago, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. COMER] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is absent, and I am unable to obtain a transfer. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]; and

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 34, as follows:

So the amendment of MR. SMITH of Georgia was laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in reservation No. 2.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHEPPARD (when Mr. CULBERSON'S name was called). My colleague, the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is necessarily absent. If present he would vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before of my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. I am told that I may transfer my pair to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. This I do, and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]; and

So reservation No. 2, reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The treaty is in the Senate and open to amendment or to further reservations. The Chair inquires now, are there any further amendments, reservations, interpretations, or suggestions to be made? The Chair hears none, and so declares that there are none.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I want to say, first, that it is necessary in order to comply with the rule that we take an adjournment, because the rule provides that the resolution of ratification shall be proposed on a subsequent day, which I think requires that there should be another legislative day. Before making a motion to adjourn I am going to ask the Senate to give unanimous consent that the vote on the resolution shall be taken not later than 3 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will try to get consent for some time to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. I should be only too glad to get consent for any reasonable time to-morrow, for I know that there are Senators on both sides who have engagements of the utmost importance to keep. Of course, there will be no amendments to vote on and no reservations. It will be a simple vote on the resolution of ratification.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the Senator suggest 5 o'clock?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if there is any particular hour to-morrow that would be agreeable to him, or does he object to fixing any time?

Mr. LENROOT. I object to the fixing of any time to-morrow.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that, as a preliminary, a request be made for unanimous consent that all speeches be limited to one hour. I think there would be very few which would be of that length, and I would prefer to suggest 30 minutes, but I know of one or two Senators who would perhaps like to discuss the matter for an hour.

Mr. LODGE. I did not know there would be any speeches of an hour. Would not half an hour do?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It would suit me admirably; 25 minutes would suit me better, and 20 minutes better still; but the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] advises me that he would like to speak for an hour. I would be willing to make the agreement that all speeches shall be limited to 30 minutes, except that of the Senator from Georgia, who might have an hour. I will make that request. I ask unanimous consent that all speeches be limited to 30 minutes, except the speech of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; we can not make exceptions.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not willing to be limited to less than an hour. I may not use that amount of time, but there is something I want to say, and under the rules of the Senate I have the right to do so.

Mr. LODGE. Unquestionably. I am very sorry that we can not get some agreement, for I know there are several Senators on both sides to whom it is of great importance to get away, and there are some Senators who are making a great effort to remain here.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that an adjournment be taken until 10 o'clock to-morrow. However, I believe there is a meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee to-morrow morning.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think we can meet to-morrow at 10 o'clock. There is very important business to come before the Committee on Foreign Relations to-morrow morning.

Mr. LODGE. Then I will strike a happy medium between the regular hour and the suggestions of the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Nebraska, and will move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, is it not possible to arrive at some kind of a conclusion about the time for a vote to-morrow? Does the Senator from Wisconsin occupy the position that he will consent to no time for a vote?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts will yield, I merely want to say to the Senator from Missouri that if he and his colleagues did not feel certain that this treaty would be defeated, we would have to have a cloture rule in order to shut off debate on the part of the Senator from Missouri and his colleagues.

I have no desire to delay. I am willing to have it proceed in the usual order; I am willing to have the speeches limited to an hour, but I do not agree further than that.

Mr. REED. Then I ask unanimous consent that speeches on the resolution of ratification shall be limited to an hour, and that no Senator shall be permitted to speak more than one hour in all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the proposed agreement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Massachusetts, who is in charge of the resolution. I understand that an agreement was stated on the floor that all absent Senators should be paired so as to represent their expressed views. I think that should be included in the agreement.

Mr. LODGE. No agreement can be made, Mr. President. I will say to the Senator that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] can tell him about the pairs. I think they are covered.

Mr. CURTIS. They are all covered except one. This side has furnished six of the pairs, and we have asked the other side to furnish two to cover one of their absentees.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think before we make an agreement, as this is a very vital question, we should have an understanding about the pairs.

Mr. LODGE. There has been that understanding, and every effort has been made. If the Senators on the other side will furnish us with two more, they will be covered. We have furnished six already.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think there will be any difficulty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Pairs on the question of ratification?

Mr. LODGE. I am speaking of the double pairs.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that can be arranged.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the proposed agreement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, before we enter into an agreement to vote—and I shall be glad to enter into any agreement to vote—the important question is the question of pairs, and I think the understanding should be included in the agreement. It has been done in the Senate before, and before we reach a vote an arrangement should be made, which I have no doubt can be made, that the absentees shall be paired to represent their position in the matter.

Mr. LODGE. I agree with the Senator from Alabama that that ought to be done, and it must be done. We must make that arrangement, as we did on the suffrage vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If I understand from the Senator from Massachusetts that no vote will be insisted on until the pairs are made, of course, he being the leader of the majority party in the Senate, I accept that.

Mr. LODGE. I have not undertaken to make any agreement on anything, because there have been objections to everything, and I can not make an agreement on that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If I have an understanding with the Senator from Massachusetts, the leader of the majority party, that before we come to a final vote we will pair the absentees, then we can come to an agreement such as has been proposed.

Mr. LODGE. I can only say that that is my purpose and intention.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I wish to state that when the question of pairs came up, it was understood that the other side would furnish, or try to furnish, one-half.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just what does the Senator mean by "the other side"?

Mr. CURTIS. The Democratic side.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is not a question of party. The Senator means that every man who votes against the ratification will be entitled to two pairs in favor of ratification?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly. In going over the situation we found that the other side was unable to furnish the number of pairs they thought they could. To-night we found that we on this side could furnish six of the eight required, and I have requested Senators on the other side with whom I have been negotiating for two or three days to furnish those two pairs to take care of one absentee on the other side who is away unpaired.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me a moment, I want to say to the Senator from Alabama he will see the impossibility of making an absolute agreement on that point, because in that case either side could postpone a vote indefinitely.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not ask the Senator from Massachusetts to agree to something that would be impossible. As I stated before, if we have a clear understanding that before a vote shall reach its final consummation we will arrange the pairs so that the absentees may be properly represented that is all I ask. But I want that understood before we enter into any agreement.

Mr. LODGE. I can not undertake to enter into an agreement of that sort. In that case we might never reach a vote. One side or the other would have nothing to do but to refuse pairs.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can assure the Senator that gentlemen on this side of the aisle are just as anxious to reach a conclusion as gentlemen on the other side. The only thing I want to be sure about is that all the absentees shall be properly represented on the vote.

Mr. LODGE. I can only assure the Senator that that is my desire, and I shall do everything in my power to bring it about.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, replying to the Senator from Alabama, it is impossible for anybody to press the Senate to a vote. That can only be done by putting on the cloture rule, which requires a two-thirds vote. The matter of pairs, of course, is a matter for each Senator, and no unanimous-consent agreement here can compel an individual Senator to pair with an absentee if he does not want to do it.

Mr. LODGE. That is the precise point.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I realize that, but if there is an understanding that the pairs will be furnished I think it can be arranged.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I hope we can. If the Senator proposes a unanimous consent agreement that the other side of the Chamber shall furnish pairs and there is no objection to it then there is the unanimous consent agreement of the Senate that that shall be done, and it is going to be done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will permit me, I believe the matter is in course of adjustment. There has been some difficulty here in securing Senators who propose to vote for ratification to pair with an absent Senator who proposes to vote against ratification, but one Senator has already volunteered to do so and I think by early to-morrow morning the arrangement will be made for the other.

Mr. LODGE. Then, Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 19, 1920, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 18, 1920.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m., and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. WALSH).

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We invoke Thy blessing, Almighty Father, upon this legislative body, that its Members may be inspired by the clearest and most patriotic conception of the task before them, that its legislative acts may be highly conducive to peace and prosperity, that good government may more and more obtain, and our Republic become the beacon light to guide the weary, warring nations in the Old World to the better way; in Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

NORMAN E. IVES.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Accounts, I ask consideration of the privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois presents a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

House resolution 460.

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House $1,200 to Norman E. Ives for extra and expert services to the Committee on Invalid Pensions during the first and second sessions of the Sixty-sixth Congress as assistant clerk to said committee, by detail from the Bureau of Pensions, pursuant to law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, is this the usual appropriation that is made for the man who is detailed from the Pension Bureau for the assistance of the Committee on Invalid Pensions?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes. It has been the custom to appropriate $1,200 to each of these appointees from the Pension Bureau for the long session and $800 for the short session. Last year, by some mistake and for no apparent reason, the two men were given $2,600 and $2,400, respectively. This resolution contemplates only $1,200, and it is proposed to appropriate $800 for the next session.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. As I understand, this covers the present session of Congress.

Mr. IRELAND. It covers the extraordinary session and this session.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is usual to bring these resolutions in toward the end of the session of Congress, I think.

Mr. IRELAND. As to the exact date I am not informed.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This will cover the balance of this session of Congress?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know that it makes any difference when it is brought in, except that the man might be detailed elsewhere.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How did they happen to give $2,600 last year?

Mr. IRELAND. I am unable to say why that was. I think it occurred simply because they carelessly followed the resolution offered in the previous session.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does this raise the amount?

Mr. IRELAND. Oh, no. It will cut it down $600 and $400, respectively, for the entire Sixty-sixth Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. These clerks earn their money, anyway.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

WAYNE W. CORDELL.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Accounts, I ask consideration of the following privileged resolution, which is of the same nature.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois presents another privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

House resolution 462.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House $1,200 to Wayne W. Cordell for extra and expert services rendered to the Committee on Pensions during the first and second sessions of the Sixty-sixth Congress as assistant clerk to said committee, by detail from the Bureau of Pensions, pursuant to law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

H. M. VANDERVORT.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Accounts, I ask consideration of the following further resolution of the same nature.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois presents a further privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

House resolution 461.

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House $1,200 to H. M. Vandervort for extra and expert services to the Committee on Invalid Pensions during the first and second sessions of the Sixty-sixth Congress as assistant clerk to said committee, by detail from the Bureau of Pensions, pursuant to law.

Mr. IRELAND. I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Accounts a question.

Mr. IRELAND. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. How many special clerks does this make for this particular committee?

Mr. IRELAND. One for the Committee on Pensions and two for the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BLANTON. In addition to how many other clerks that they have?

Mr. IRELAND. I think they are allotted a chief clerk, an assistant clerk, a stenographer, and a messenger.

Mr. BLANTON. And they are all necessary?

Mr. IRELAND. It is so represented to our committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman will yield to me a minute, I will explain to the gentleman from Texas about these clerks. Every pension bill introduced in the House has to be investigated and the records in the Pension Office carefully gone over. There is a general impression in the country that we pension anybody who asks for it. That is not true at all. This committee have each one of these claims investigated as to the record in the Pension Office, and there is an immense amount of work to be done, and the clerk of the Pensions Committee could not do it to save his life.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri, I think, was probably present—because he is here most of the time—when it developed a short time ago that this committee does not investigate a single one of these cases itself; that it merely takes the recommendation of the chairman of the committee, based upon the report of some clerk, as to whether each particular pension should be granted. So, after all, these clerks are doing the work that the committee are supposed to do, I presume.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When I first came here it happened that among other things I was put on the Committee on Pensions, and I never did harder work in my life, and no committee ever did harder work. These expert clerks detailed from the Pension Office are absolutely indispensable to the work of these two committees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CORRECTION OF A NAME.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized to correct the resolution (H. Res. 361) adopted by the House December 18, 1919, by striking out the word "Angeline" and inserting the word "Angela."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, the original resolution was adopted for the purpose of paying the usual amount to the widow of a deceased House employee, and when the voucher came back to the Clerk it was signed "Angela" instead of "Angeline." This is simply to correct the resolution in accordance with that fact.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE VALUE OF SERVICE IN CONGRESS.

Mr. BRYNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing some extracts from a letter written by the gentleman from Ohio, Gen. SHERWOOD, to his home paper, on the subject of the value of service in the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The extract is as follows:

THE VALUE OF SERVICE.

Some college and high school fraternities are now debating political subjects, including the question, How long should a Congressman serve to reach his highest usefulness to his constituents? Some districts—notably the fourth Ohio—have established the two-term system on the theory that the honor should go around in order to give each of the six counties in the district the opportunity to name a Congressman. This district is now represented by the Hon. BENJAMIN F. WELTY, of Lima, who is the ranking Democratic member in the Committee on Railroads and Canals and is now on his second term. In my humble judgment a Congressman should be selected on his merit without regard to his habitation. And his value as a sponsor for his constituents depends largely upon his experience, his industry, and his ability to grasp the vital questions before Congress. Under the complicated rules of parliamentary procedure of the House of Representatives, the most complicated of any parliamentary body around the world, a new Member is hardly able to command attention on the floor of the House in debate during his first term and is not able to secure a chairmanship of an important committee under the rules until he has served at least three terms. Hence the intrinsic value to any constituency of a Member whose influence is measured by his holding an important chairmanship. During the past 75 years the South has held an important position in legislation by keeping experienced and trained Members in Congress. For instance, in the present Congress the South has 1 Member who has served 26 years continuously, 2 who have served 24 years continuously, 10 who have served 20 years, and 6 who have served 16 years. The North has a list of 60 Members who are serving their first term and a list of 70 Members who are serving their second term. The balance of the 435 Members of Congress have served two terms or more. The two longest-service Members are JOSEPH G. CANNON, of Illinois, 44 years, and FREDERICK H. GILLETT, of Massachusetts, Speaker, 28 years.

ARMY REORGANIZATION BILL.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12775, the Army reorganization bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army reorganization bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916.

SEC. 44. That section 89 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 89. Animals for National Guard: Funds allotted by the Secretary of War for the support of the National Guard shall be available for the purchase, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, of animals conforming to the Regular Army standards for the training of the National Guard, said animals to remain the property of the United States and to be used solely for military purposes.

"The number of animals so issued shall not exceed 32 for each battery of field artillery or troop of cavalry, and a proportionate number for other mounted organizations, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe; and the Secretary of War is further authorized to issue, in lieu of purchase, for the training of such organizations, condemned Army animals which are no longer fit for service, but which may be suitable for the purposes of instruction, such animals to be sold as now provided by law when said purposes shall have been served."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The other day I offered an amendment providing for compulsory universal military training of the citizens of America of the prescribed age of 19 years. At that time I stated that it was practically the proposition made by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. There were some differences of view among men in favor of universal military training. I hold an opinion that the matter should be amended in certain respects, and in order that my views on the subject, or rather the modifications I had in mind may be set out in debate, I would like to have them printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman has the right to do that under the order of the House.

Mr. CALDWELL. I understand I have the right to do it, and I was doing it under that right.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will this be practically in line with the speech which the gentleman made in general debate?

Mr. CALDWELL. I hope so.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to say that if the gentleman will examine the Chicago Tribune of Tuesday last he will find an editorial commending the gentleman's effort very highly.

Mr. CALDWELL. I thank the gentleman for calling my attention to it.

The following is the extension referred to by Mr. CALDWELL:

"SEC. —. Military training of citizens: Beginning with the fiscal year 1923 the Secretary of War is directed to provide for the military, physical, and vocational training and education of persons hereinafter designated, who shall be inducted into the Army for this purpose and shall not be counted as a part of the enlisted strength of the Regular Army. The period of training shall be four months, with such additional time as may be necessary for enrollment, mobilization, and demobilization, and may, with the consent of the individual, be extended for a further period of not exceeding two months. Persons undergoing training shall receive transportation, clothing, laundry, shelter, subsistence, and medical attendance, and pay at the rate of $5 a month.

"Beginning with the fiscal year 1923 an annual registration shall be made of all male citizens of the United States who during the calendar year of registration will attain the age of 19 years and who reside within the continental limits of the United States, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Panama Canal Zone, with the exception of persons on active duty in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, National Guard, or Coast Guard. In order to carry out the provisions of this section relative to registration and induction so much of the provisions of the act of May 18, 1917, entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States' as may be necessary and appropriate are hereby extended and made applicable for this purpose. The President shall make regulations necessary to carry out the provisions of this section, and shall fix the compensation of members of local and district boards and their necessary employees.

"There shall annually be inducted in the Army for training, first, persons between the ages of 17 and 21 years who have had no service in the Army or training under the provisions of this section who are physically qualified for enlistment in the Regular Army and who enlist voluntarily for training; second, all persons registered in that year, with the exception of those mentally, morally, or physically incapable of profiting by such training, those in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support, which renders their exemption advisable, as may be prescribed by regulations, and members of the Army Reserve; third, all persons registered in the next preceding calendar year who are exempted from training under the provisions of this section and in whose case the cause for exemption has ceased to exist.

"Provided, That no exemption shall be granted to any person of the prescribed age who shall upon his examination by the local board be found unable to read, write, or speak the English language, except said inability is caused by reason of mental or physical defect, nor shall an exemption be granted to any such person found to be suffering from a physical defect or disease which military training or treatments would be expected to overcome: And provided further, That the period of training herein provided for shall be at such time in the year as will, in the opinion of the local board, least interfere with business, industry, agriculture, and education in the locality.

"The Secretary of War shall appoint a civilian superintendent for each post, camp, and cantonment where military training is undertaken pursuant to the foregoing provisions who shall have such power of supervision, control, regulation, and review as the Secretary of War may from time to time generally or specifically delegate to him."

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 46. That section 109 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 109. Pay for National Guard officers: Captains and lieutenants belonging to organizations of the National Guard shall receive compensation at the rate of one-thirtieth of the monthly base pay of their grades as prescribed for the Regular Army for each regular drill or other period of instruction authorized by the Secretary of War, not exceeding five in any one calendar month, at which they shall have been officially present for the entire required period, and at which at least 50 per cent of the commissioned strength and 60 per cent of the enlisted strength attend and participate for not less than one and one-half hours. Captains commanding organizations shall receive $240 a year in addition to the drill pay herein prescribed. Officers above the grade of captain shall receive $500 a year, and officers below the grade of major, not belonging to organizations, shall receive four-thirtieths of the monthly base pay of their grades for satisfactory performance of their appropriate duties under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe. Pay under the provisions of this section shall not accrue to any officer during a period when he shall be lawfully entitled to the same pay as an officer of corresponding grade in the Regular Army."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In the early part of this bill I made a few remarks on the question of transportation of the Army and the matter of the organization of a transportation service. Friendly criticism is always valuable, and particularly when it is constructive. It so happens that this morning's Washington Post has a friendly criticism of the Republicans on their attitude, and under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks——

Mr. MADDEN. I object to that; it does not give leave to print an editorial.

Mr. CALDWELL. If the gentleman objects to printing an editorial from a Republican newspaper, all right. I think I have the right——

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the gentleman has the right; I do not care what the newspaper is.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to ask the gentleman if it is not true that he also favored giving rank to nurses in addition to favoring the support of a transportation corps?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. And the editorial comments on that.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there are no newspaper men in the press gallery.

Mr. CALDWELL. That makes no difference; I want to put it in the RECORD, which has the largest circulation of any newspaper in the country.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman from New York made some remarks in the House the other day, and although I think there were no newspaper men in the press gallery at the time, I notice that the greatest paper in the world, the Chicago Tribune, commented on the gentleman's remarks in a very favorable and complimentary editorial. I hope the gentleman will look it up.

Mr. CALDWELL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. LITTLE. I think that paper has a representative in Congress, so they always know what is going on.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, within a few days the Committee on Military Affairs will translate the bill we are now proposing to enact into law into dollars and cents. At that time we will have some idea of the cost of this reorganized Army to the taxpayers of the United States. I think, perhaps, it is well at this juncture to call the attention of the committee to a situation now exising in the city of Washington that will be aggravated if some of the proposals in this bill are finally enacted into law, and especially the so-called Sanford amendment.

We have in this city to-day 722 officers of the Regular Army. Their average monthly base pay is $300 a month, or a total of $216,000. Their average commutation of quarters is $75 a month, or $54,150. Longevity pay $75 a month, or $54,150. Heat and light $25 a month, or $18,650, or a total of $342,950 a month, which for the year amounts to $4,115,400.

In addition to these officers of the Regular Army we have in the city of Washington 1,090 emergency officers. Their average base pay per month is $200, or a total of $218,000 per month. Their commutation of quarters is $50 per month, or a total of $54,500 per month. Their longevity pay is $10 a month, or $10,800. Their average heat and light is $20, or a total of $21,800, making a total monthly pay of $305,100, and a total for one year of $3,665,200.

The total for the Regular Army officer and emergency Army officer in the city of Washington is $7,780,600. The average clerk hire for these officers is $1,500 per year, and I expect if the truth were known that it is twice $1,500 per year; but making the calculation of $1,500 per year for clerk hire for these officers it amounts to $2,718,000, making a grand total of $10,498,600. I am informed by officers of long experience, not only in the city of Washington but throughout the country and abroad, that 200 men would be amply sufficient to discharge all the official duties incumbent upon officers of the Army in the city of Washington.

If this is correct and allowing these 200 officers the same base pay, the same commutation of quarters, the same longevity pay, the same heat and light, given to Regular Army officers first mentioned, the total expenses of these officers and the clerk hire will amount to $1,140,000 per year. Deducting this from the total expenditure of $10,498,600 it would leave $9,058,600, which is practically thrown away. Now, if these officers are not needed, and I am convinced they are not needed in the city of Washington, and they are certainly not needed anywhere else or they would be taken some place else, we are to-day paying for this aristocratic Military Establishment that they may live in the city of Washington more than nine and a half million dollars of the people's money that had better be thrown away for this reason, that in addition to the expense I have called attention to they have established here quartermaster corps furnishing food products, clothing, and so forth, to these officers and their families practically at cost with a sufficient amount above cost to cover overhead expense, and that means the employment of hundreds of men to conduct those quartermaster establishments.

It means the employment of many trucks to deliver the goods, with chauffeurs to run those trucks, and, in addition to that, these officers, most of them—I dare say the majority of them—to-day are running at the expense of the Government an automobile, together with a chauffeur, so that the items I have called attention to in all probability would not cover half the expense incident, if you please, to these Army officers in the city of Washington who are here performing no good purpose, are absolutely useless, so far as conducting business is concerned. Not only that, but they are occupying, of necessity, together with their families, quarters in apartment houses and rented houses scattered all over the city, if you please, that could better be used for people who do have to stay in Washington in the performance of their duty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. In consequence, they are making the cost of living of the citizens of the city of Washington higher than otherwise in the increased cost of rent and everything else pertaining to life. Now, then, I call the attention of the committee to this fact, in order that you may know something that is going to transpire if this bill is enacted into law: If the so-called Sanford amendment is permitted to remain as a part of this bill, it will mean another increase of officers, not only in the city of Washington but all over this country. At every one of these little posts, of necessity, there must be established an independent and separate construction officer, together with all of his deputies and clerical hire, that will swell, if you please, this army of officers far beyond what it is to-day. So it is worth while, I think, in considering what our action shall be in the final determination of this thing, what it means in cost when we provide for a force of 376,000 men, when there is not expected ever to have an Army of more than 180,000, with a complement of officers twice as great as an Army of this size requires. Is it not time we should halt and take notice of what we are doing and that we shall consider the expense we are entailing on the people in carrying out such a program?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Can not we have the record disclose these facts from official sources?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have it right here, so far as this roster of Army officers is concerned; and, in addition, they are so numerous that they have gotten out an independent telephone directory of the city of Washington showing the number of the telephone and where they live as large as the telephone directory of an ordinary city.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in accord with the recommendations made by the provisions of the bill just read in respect to the compensation to be paid to the National Guard, and in this connection I wish to call the attention of the committee to a few facts which have been disclosed to me in a letter just received from a man who served at the front. We have a great deal of agitation for increased compensation for men in the Army and Navy just now, and it might be interesting if I should read a letter which I just received for the information of this body, as I think it will be illuminating, and I think the letter, perhaps as strongly as anything else could, indicates the fact that there is no necessity for increasing the compensation of these men in the Regular Establishment to keep them in the service. This letter is dated the 14th of March. I am not going to use the name of the man who wrote it. He says:

Sitting in my local union hall this afternoon I heard about 20 men discussing recent events in Congress, and unanimously you were acclaimed for your fearless and patriotic talk recently on increased compensation for Government employees versus taxes. Chicago must be proud of its Representative from the first Illinois district.

[Applause.]

We hope to elect Representatives of like patriotic caliber from Maryland.

Mr. YATES. What is the reference to other Members?

Mr. MADDEN (reading):

Mr. OLNEY is impregnated with the virus of Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Public Health Service increase-of-pay propaganda.

[Applause.]

I desire to say right here that Mr. OLNEY injected remarks in a speech of mine the other day, and I expect that is why reference is made to him.

Those five services wear uniforms and propagandize together, for any special legislation benefiting one of them is sooner or later made applicable to the other four. He is a member of the Military Affairs Committee and could easily learn that the large number of officers resigning are mostly—90 per cent—reserve officers whose private affairs demand their attention, and entered the service only for the period of the war.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. No; not now.

Mr. CALDWELL. Right there——

Mr. MADDEN. I decline to yield. He says:

They should have been released before now, just as Regular officers who were promoted from one to five grades on the temporary lists should have been demoted before now, and for like reason (economy's sake) thousands of civil employees should have been separated entirely from the Government service.

The very small number of Regular Army and Navy officers who have resigned—Representative OLNEY and Senator WADSWORTH to the contrary notwithstanding—will in no wise affect the services. Some few resigned because of lucrative positions outside, some because of grouches, and some because they could not pass pending examinations.

It is regrettable that there has been so much legislation in behalf of compensation for our Army and Navy that members of committees pertaining to those affairs think of only the base pay. One of the members of our union has a brother who is a major in the Regular Army and is 34 years old. He says that a lieutenant commander in the Navy gets the same pay as his brother, and some perquisites, excepting horse feed——

Mr. MONDELL. Of the horse marines? [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. He says:

excepting horse feed. He was not dead sure about "horse feed," because he says Marine Corps officers get "horse-feed" allowance and generally the Navy get whatever the Marine Corps does, and vice versa. His brother, the major, is in charge of an ammunition depot——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five additional minutes or such time as I may need to finish the reading of this letter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks five additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. He says:

His brother, the major, is in charge of an ammunition depot, and has one sergeant and two privates under him and six or more civilian employees. So, this mighty major has a "battalion" of nine men. He lives in a $21,000 brick house, built at taxpayers' expense, and has fuel and electric light and water furnished free. At the depot is a five-passenger touring car (and chauffeur) for "Government use only," but, however urgent, no one but the major or his family rides in it. His duties—signing reports, typed by the sergeant—require as much as 10 minutes on some days. His pay is the following:

Annual base pay	$3,000
Longevity (10 per cent for every 5 years' service, including 4 years at Military Academy—he graduated 12 years ago)	900
Provender for two horses (which are used by his children—the major can not ride)	432
Total compensation	4,332

Taking into consideration his duty and age, it does not appear the major "should worry." He isn't; for he is sensibly economical, and with savings from his salary is buying real estate here in Baltimore. Now, remember, by act of Congress this major pays no income tax whatever, because all officers are exempted whose salary is less than $3,500, and in addition he is allowed the exemption of $2,000 for a married man—a total of $5,500.

Yes; that is true; that is the law.

He says further:

Were not the major living in a War Department residence, he would be allowed $720 annually for rent and about $250 for fuel and lights. If his rent and fuel and lights were only half those amounts, he nevertheless would be paid $970 in cash. When traveling he receives 8 cents per mile. He has been ordered to Presidio Barracks, Calif., three times in two years, each trip netting him a nice sum. For service outside the United States, he receives another 10 per cent; and if he enters the Aviation Service he will receive 50 per cent additional. At all times he receives medical attention, medicines, and hospital privileges free. And if at any period of his career he is no longer able to function, he goes on the retired list at three-quarters pay.

There are scores of generals and admirals—most of the former who never saw a division of troops and most of the latter who never commanded a fleet—are drawing more pay to-day than are Members of Congress. Those men don't deserve—yea, don't need—an increase of 31 per cent in salaries. The salary list of our Army and Navy needs revision downward!

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 60, line 20, after the word "Army," insert: "Provided, That section 9 of an act amending the act entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, approved May 18, 1917,' approved August 31, 1918, shall also apply to the purchase of uniforms and accouterments and equipment for cash by officers of the National Guard and National Guard Reserve whether in State or Federal service, on proper identification, and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment simply extends to National Guard officers the right to purchase from the Government their uniforms and accouterments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MONDELL. I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what our Military Establishment is going to cost. I am afraid it is going to cost more than the American people want to pay. The naval appropriation bill has just been introduced, carrying, I believe, $425,000,000. That is approximately $225,000,000 below the estimates—$225,000,000 below what the department wants and insists upon—and yet it is nearly half of the total annual expenditure of the Government prior to the Great War. The Army bill will come in in a few days. I do not see how it is going to be possible to keep that bill much below $400,000,000, and I am afraid it will go above that before we get through. Eight hundred million dollars to $850,000,000 seems to be about the least sum we can bring our military expenditures within for the coming fiscal year. No nation ever expended such sums prior to the World War in time of peace for its military establishment. Imperial Germany in its palmiest days of preparation never spent that amount. Of course, it costs us very much more to do the same thing in a military way than it costs anyone else, and I am not complaining about that. We do not have the same standards, thank God, that some other people have been compelled to live under. We have heard a good deal about the inadequacy of Army pay, and yet the pay of our commissioned personnel has always been much higher than that of any other army in the world. And I am not complaining about that. Just now we are being asked, among other things, to increase that pay very greatly, increases that would add to this military expense anywhere from $60,000,000 to $90,000,000 annually. If we agree to the increases that are asked, and if the naval bill shall not be reduced below what it now carries, and if the Army bill shall be kept as low as we hope it will, we shall be looking forward to a military expenditure running close to $900,000,000 in the days when we are talking about leagues of nations and peace treaties and peace on earth and good will to men generally.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman believe that the League of Nations, even if it were adopted, would prevent war?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know. I am not as wise as a lot of people claim to be. I do not know. I do not think that the League of Nations that has been proposed would prevent war; no. You can not avoid war by inviting yourself into participation in the settlement of the quarrels of all the world; but I do not want to discuss it at this time. God knows we have problems enough of our own here without taking up what are, for the time being, other folks' problems. But I want to call attention to our problems, our own problems. Do the best we can, reduce the administration's estimates by half, and we are facing a military program at the time when men are hoping and praying for peace threatening to cost within 10 per cent of the total cost of running all of the Government establishments prior to the outbreak of the Great War.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for five additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know how much of this we can avoid. But I have said what I have to call attention to the fact that we keep adding to and adding to and adding to and adding to these costs a little at a time—a little at a time—without appreciating it, and in ways that, I am frank to say, it is a little bit difficult for one to oppose or criticize. Now, we are proposing to add a little more right here, just a little more; nobody knows just how much. It is a curious thing that when we talk about the pay of the officers of the Army——

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In a moment; when we talk about the pay of the officers of the Army we seldom take into consideration the benefits which they secure through their opportunities to trade at the quartermaster stores; and yet that privilege, for a man having a family of five, in my opinion, must be worth from $500 to $1,000 a year.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; in a moment.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. We do not sell at cost at these Army stores. We sell below actual total cost. We sell at the exact wholesale cost at the time and place of purchase.

Mr. CALDWELL. Plus.

Mr. MONDELL. Plus nothing.

Mr. CALDWELL. Plus 3 per cent.

Mr. KAHN. Plus 10 per cent.

Mr. MONDELL. When?

Mr. KAHN. Always.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to be accurate. Is there any plus?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes. There is a plus.

Mr. MONDELL. What is it?

Mr. CALDWELL. My understanding is that it is 3 per cent. The gentleman from California may be right. It is either 3 or 10 per cent. I think it is 3 per cent.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. I want to state that I was at the stores here in Washington a few days ago and asked the very question, whether any of the material was sold at actual cost, without any increase, and I was told, no; that there was an advance over the actual cost.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, now, that may be; but I doubt it. My understanding is the regulations provide for sales to officers at original cost. I think that in the main these articles are sold for exactly what they cost at the place of purchase, without transportation added, without consideration of loss or deterioration, and without charge for the handling or the delivery of the goods. Now, there may be a very slight per cent put on, but if there is, it is very inconsiderable, and it is a wonderful advantage. Just go to one of these stores and price their goods. I happen to be familiar, through friends who have the good fortune to be able to trade at these stores, with the fact of the very low prices which they pay for things compared with the ordinary retail price.

Now, recently we have enlarged that privilege to include the purchase by officers of their uniforms. Now we are are proposing to extend that privilege to the officers in the National Guard. I do not see how you can very well put that plan into operation as a practical matter. The National Guard is scattered all over the country. Unless we are going into the business of establishing Government stores all over the country, in which we shall sell to privileged people at cost, I think we had better begin to carefully consider what we are doing.

The other day on a conference report, and without any discussion, we gave the privilege of purchase of the Quartermaster Department to the Coast Guard. There are no Army stores in the vicinity of the Coast Guard. It will entail a large additional expense. If the pay of the Coast Guard is not high enough, let us raise it, increase it, but these unconsidered ways of increasing pay, these additions here and there, are very, very questionable. I do not know how much they amount to or how much they cost.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired.

Mr. MONDELL. If I may have two minutes more I will yield.

Mr. McKENZIE. You can answer my question in one minute.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask for one minute, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. I simply wanted to call to the attention of the gentleman from Wyoming the fact that the pending amendment does not have anything to do with these stores. It has reference to the uniforms of the officers in the National Guard.

Mr. MONDELL. The purchase of uniforms at wholesale from the Government.

Mr. McKENZIE. It simply puts them on the same basis as officers of the Regular Army.

Mr. MONDELL. That is what I said.

Mr. McKENZIE. It does not require any stores.

Mr. MONDELL. Perhaps you can handle goods without stores. Let us strike out the word "stores" if the gentleman does not like it. There must be some place where these goods are handled. If the word stores is not proper in military parlance I will strike it out; but somewhere these goods have to be handled, and they cost money. I do not know where it is going to stop. I am not opposing this particular extension of privilege, for I am not sufficiently informed to do so, but I would like to know about how much additional cost it will entail. Nobody knows, and in the words of a song very popular just now, nobody seems to care.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the statement was frequently made on this floor before we got into the World War that wars past and preparation for wars to come cost the taxpayers of this country 70 per cent of all the taxes paid into the Treasury of the United States. That was probably true, but we failed to properly prepare our country against war, and in the 19 months of war in which we were engaged we have had to pay $33,000,000,000, a sum so staggering that the taxpayers of this Nation are groaning under the burden.

We recognize the fact that the cost of our Military Establishment and our Naval Establishment in this country is infinitely greater than it is in any other country on earth, because we give our officers and men much larger pay than is received by those in the armies of the other countries. In the European nations the pay before the war to the average soldier was from 2 to 5 cents a day, except in England, where he was paid practically $8 a month. We paid our enlisted men $15 a month before we got into the war. Does anyone want our officers and men to be treated niggardly? Does not everyone recognize that we must, in order to uphold our position as a Nation, uphold our national honor and prestige, maintain our Military and Naval Establishments on a scale commensurate with our position in the world? God knows I am as much opposed to war as any man on this floor. I do not want war. I have seen what occurred in Europe. God forbid that anything of that kind should ever happen in this country.

We speak of the cost; unfortunately we always refer to monetary costs; but we do not refer ordinarily to the 80,000 young Americans who sleep the sleep everlasting on foreign soil because their country was unprepared to defend its rights. [Applause.] We do not mention the 206,000 men who were wounded, 80,000 of whom are practically crippled for life, and who have a right to expect this country to make proper compensation for their losses. That is going to run, in my opinion, into the hundreds of millions of dollars in the future, all due to our unpreparedness.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CLEARY. How about all the people who were killed in the German Army? They were prepared, were they not?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; they were prepared.

I want to call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that for 43 years Germany had no war. It was a peace period that was much greater than the peace period of the United States. It was a much greater peace period than was known by France, or England, or Russia, or Italy, or any of the other powers of Europe.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman mean to convey the impression or make the argument that he believes the Prussian military system maintained the peace of Europe for 43 years?

Mr. KAHN. No; far from it. I have never believed in the Prussian military system and I do not now. I differentiate greatly between that system—which by the way is also followed by France and by Holland and by quite a number of other countries in Europe—and a system of universal training such as I favor. I have never maintained that we ought to establish the Prussian system in this country.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for one other question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. What particular factor in the Prussian preparedness was it that maintained peace?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman simply stated the fact.

Mr. KAHN. In the first place Germany upbuilt her industries and maintained her army, and no other country in Europe dared attack her.

Mr. WINGO. So the gentleman thinks the maintenance of a large army by Germany prevented other countries attacking her?

Mr. KAHN. I said that Germany was prepared to defend her rights, and that no country in Europe interfered with her rights for 43 years.

Mr. WINGO. The question on which I want to get the gentleman's judgment is what particular factor of Prussian preparedness maintained the peace of Europe.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman did not make that argument.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman from Illinois will maintain his soul in patience, he is not the only Member of the House. I am entitled to some information from the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee. I am not arguing with the gentleman from California. I am getting his judgment as to what particular feature of German preparedness it was that the gentleman thinks maintained European peace? The gentleman from California has given study to the subject. What particular factor in your opinion was it that made other nations afraid to attack her?

Mr. KAHN. We know that Germany had an army that was able to defend her rights, and no other nation in the world attempted to interfere with her rights.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman and members, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee.

In view of the fact that in a letter sent to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois by a member of a certain local union, I was criticized by some of the local members of this union for advocating increases in pay for the officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the United States and the Public Health Service, I wish to explain my position to those gentlemen and to the Members of the House.

I have always been consistent in advocating remedial conditions and legislation for all Government employees, whether they were letter carriers or officers in the Army and Navy. I have also advocated increases, too, for the enlisted men. The salaries of officers in the Army and Navy have been stationary since 1908, 12 years, and if their salaries were fair at that time and the cost of living has increased at least 100 per cent since then, you can not consistently deny them what is advocated in the Wadsworth bill, a reasonable increase of not more than 33 per cent.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OLNEY. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. How much additional pay do officers in the Army get by reason of their seniority in service? I understand their pay is raised so much for a certain number of years' service. I do not recall the law on that.

Mr. WINGO. Ten per cent every five years.

Mr. BLACK. We have no such rule as that in civilian employment. Does not the gentleman think that makes a good deal of difference?

Mr. OLNEY. No; I do not consider it so. Furthermore, statements have been made here that this increased pay would involve an extra appropriation of three or four hundred million dollars. As a matter of fact, as far as the Army officers go, it means an extra appropriation of about $25,000,000, and as to the Navy, Army, Marine Corps, and Public Health Service, it means a total increase in appropriations of $59,000,000. My good friend from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY], an able member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I understand has this matter under consideration, and immediately after this bill is completed will take up the increase for officers of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and the United States Public Health Service.

As I have said, my position is absolutely consistent. I have advocated, aided, and assisted in placing upon the statute books practically all laws fathered by NOLAN and other Members establishing remedial conditions for all Government employees. I was a member of the original minimum-wage commission of Massachusetts, which placed the minimum-wage law on the statute books of that State, which takes care of the wages of all industry, particularly oppressed. Therefore I think I am entirely consistent in advocating not only increased pay for all Government employees, and remedial conditions for them, but also for those men who guide the machinery of government.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment to put the National Guard officers on the same footing as the Regular Army officers, and I think it ought to pass. That does not indicate that I am opposed to the spirit of economy, or that I am in favor of any Prussian military system, which is the subject of this debate. The gentleman animadverts eloquently to the fact that we spent some $30,000,000,000 in this war, and he tells us that 80,000 young Americans were killed, and his argument is that if we had had preparedness they would not have been killed. I fail to see the logic of that. A man gets killed just as quickly if he is prepared as he does if he is not if an enemy bullet hits him. I do not think the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] really meant that. That would be an insult to the intelligence of the House, to presume that the war would have produced less than 80,000 deaths of American soldiers if we had been prepared. If Germany had not been prepared we would not have lost 80,000 men, and Germany would not have lost 800,000 men. But there is another feature of his argument that I want to address you on. He calls attention to the fact that we were not prepared like Russia was, like Austria was, like Germany was, or we would have had the splendid results that they have achieved. Millions upon millions spent for 50 years, and look at the magnificent achievements of their mighty armies! Their victories star the skies, and their flags float in the air of every capital—do they? Look at the splendid results in Russia! From end to end of that mighty Empire, where every man was trained and prepared for war, peace and quiet reign, peace and security are in every household, peace and quiet in every village—thanks to the preparedness of the Czar. What is actually the outcome of Russian preparedness?

Every man in Russia to-day is a fighting man, and every one of them is fighting. There is no man doing anything else, as far as anybody can learn. [Laughter.] No man dares raise his hand anywhere for any sensible purpose but some dictator at St. Petersburg sends a soldier to arrest him. Lenin's soldiers were drilled by the Czar. With them he enforces his decrees, confiscates all property, conscripts all labor, and breaks up all homes. The gentleman wants us to prepare an army for some Lenin here.

Look at Germany. They had a Government of brilliant geniuses with thousands of soldiers trained for 50 years, and now it is hammered down and toppled in the dust. We might have the same result if we spent millions on the same plan. Their trained soldiers marched in Berlin two days ago, overthrew their Republic, and they fight in the streets of 100 cities to-day.

Look at Austria. If it had not been for that big army they raised in Austria by 50 years of preparedness, you would not find the millions of her people knocking at your door begging for a crust of bread for their babies. Look at Austria, look at Russia, look at Prussia, and yet men come here and tell us that if we will spend our billions as they did, upon armies instead of putting the boys to work, we would be better off. Great God! What are they thinking of? Are we non compos mentis, that men come here with such talk? This is the Congress of the United States, and we are sent here to legislate for a hundred millions of people, and yet men come here before us on the very morning that the telegraph wire tells us that in Prussia, where men were prepared and trained for war, they are marching up and down the streets destroying the Government, killing the workmen, and in response the workmen have struck and put a stop to business all over the land as the result of the military system. And yet men come here and want us to spend our money in the same way. Has it come to this, that our intelligence is to be presumed upon? You could hear the knocking at the doors as you rose this morning, of the German military dictator overthrowing government, as did the prepared veterans of Bonaparte and Monk. But yesterday you could hear the roar of their guns as they rattled down the streets of Berlin. But yesterday you could hear the people rise up, fighting with bare hands, and stamping down a rebellion in order to put back a representative government. And yet men come here this morning and tell us that we ought to get ready to do the same thing. This country is a whole lot better prepared for war than for peace right now. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] somewhat misapprehended what was meant by the gentleman from California in what he said to the House. I am not a militaristic man, but I am inclined to think that if Germany had believed at the time the war situation became acute and the President called Congress in special session for the purpose of declaring war, that if Germany had believed at that time that this country was prepared to put a large army into the field within the course of several months peace would have been declared before we ever sent a man across the water, on terms quite as favorable as were finally entered into. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. OLNEY] a moment ago, advocating an increase in the pay of commissioned officers of the Army and Navy, laid down what appeared to be a most logical proposition—that the pay was the same now that it was 12 years ago, and if fair at that time it must be much too small because of the increase in the cost of living.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; not now. That looks like a logical proposition on its face, but it neglects to take into account a most important feature which certainly must have occurred to every Member of the House and to every one of the commissioned officers, and which I have not heard referred to in debate.

The Navy, with the coming of war and the preparation for war, has been tremendously enlarged, so that every man in the Navy, practically, among the commissioned forces has received an advance in rank and grade and pay on account of the enlargement of the Navy. Under the old normal conditions a man might remain a second lieutenant in the Navy quite a while, and as first lieutenant a long time, and if he ever got to be a captain before he was retired he was probably in luck. Now these men who were second lieutenants will soon be captains in the Navy with a very great increase of pay as well as of rank.

And by this Army bill, which proposes materially to increase the number of commissioned officers in the Army, a man who is now in the lower grade will soon be commissioned to a much higher grade, and thereby have not only the rank but his pay and emoluments largely increased. It is not the normal condition. They get an increase in pay from what they would have got under normal conditions. There were many men in the Army for years before the proposed enlargement who had received but little in the way of promotion. All of these men will receive decided promotion much more quickly than they would have received it under normal conditions. That is a proper thing to take into consideration when discussing the question of salaries for commissioned officers.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. We still have just as many second lieutenants and first lieutenants in the Army as we ever had.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, but they are younger men.

Mr. CRAGO. And they are still men who have to live and maintain their families.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Most of the second lieutenants do not have families. Everywhere else we take into consideration the length of service and the age of people when considering their pay, and these men who were in the service 12 years ago, to whom the gentleman refers, will all be paid very much higher salaries after this reorganization bill becomes a law.

Mr. CRAGO. The individuals will; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California, which, without objection, will be again reported.

There being no objection, the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 47. That section 110 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the first paragraph and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 110. Pay for National Guard enlisted men: Each enlisted man belonging to an organization of the National Guard shall receive compensation at the rate of one-thirtieth of the initial monthly pay of his grade in the Regular Army for each drill ordered for his organization where he is officially present and in which he participates for not less than one and one-half hours, not exceeding five in any one calendar month: Provided, That no enlisted man shall receive any pay under the provisions of this section for any month in which he shall have attended less than 60 per cent of the drills or other exercises prescribed for his organization: Provided further, That the proviso contained in section 92 of this act shall not operate to prevent the payment of enlisted men actually present at any duly ordered drill or other exercise: And provided further, That periods of any actual military duty equivalent to the drills herein prescribed (except those periods of service for which members of the National Guard may become lawfully entitled to the same pay as officers and enlisted men of the corresponding grades in the Regular Army) may be accepted as service in lieu of such drills when so provided by the Secretary of War."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendments, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 61, line 5, after the word "five," insert in lieu thereof the word "eight."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the other committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 61, line 6, after the word "month," insert the words "and not exceeding 60 drills in one year."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section be now closed.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman reserve that for a moment, until I can submit a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. KAHN. Very well.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print the article to which I referred this morning, it being a friendly criticism of the bill which we are about to complete.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an editorial from the Washington Post of this morning. Is there objection?

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion that all debate upon this section do now close.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. KAHN. Has the gentleman from Alabama an amendment which he desires to submit?

Mr. DENT. I hope the gentleman will not make that motion at this time. I have a five-minute speech on this bill that I want to get rid of, and then I am through with it.

Mr. KAHN. May I suggest to the gentleman that he take the time on the next section?

Mr. DENT. Very well.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the section do now close.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, can not I get the floor to move to strike out the last word?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has a right to move that debate close. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California.

Mr. LITTLE. Then I shall have to make the point of order that there is no quorum present, if we can not have free debate upon this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ten Members present, a quorum. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California to close debate upon the section.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 48. That section 111 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following: "Upon the discharge from the military service of the United States of any enlisted man of the National Guard drafted into the Army under the provisions of this section, or of any other law, he shall, unless released by the State, resume his membership in the militia, and shall be held to service in the National Guard for that portion of his enlistment which had not been completed at the date of his draft."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment——

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 61, line 21, after the words "Sec. 48," strike out all of lines 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25, and on page 62, all of lines 1, 2, 3, and 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following: That section 111 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 111. National Guard when drafted into Federal service: When Congress shall have authorized the use of the armed land forces of the United States for any purpose requiring the use of troops in excess of those of the Regular Army, the President may, under such regulations, including such physical examination as he may prescribe, draft into the military service of the United States, to serve therein for the period of the war or emergency, unless sooner discharged, any or all members of the National Guard and of the National Guard Reserve. The status of all persons so drafted shall be changed automatically on the date such draft takes effect from service under the dual oath to an exclusive United States service. On the termination of the emergency, all former National Guard officers and men shall be relieved from service under the draft, and upon being relieved shall revert automatically to their previous National Guard status, and shall be credited on their National Guard service for all time served in the Army of the United States. They shall from said date of draft be subject to such laws and regulations for the government of the Army of the United States as may be applicable to members of the Army, and shall be organized into units corresponding as far as practicable to those of the Regular Army or shall be otherwise assigned as the President may direct. The commissioned officers of said organization shall be appointed from among the members thereof; officers with rank not above that of colonel to be appointed by the President alone, and all other officers to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Officers and enlisted men while in the service of the United States under the terms of this section shall have the same pay and allowances as officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army of the same grades and the same prior service."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I may say that this amendment is intended to take the place of section 48 as printed in the bill. The purpose is to enable the National Guard organizations to revert to their former status at the end of any war or emergency. Under the national-defense bill and existing legislation the National Guard organizations were drafted into the service of the United States, and when they were discharged from that service they went out of existence. Of course, in many States it proved to be a very serious matter. It is the hope of the committee that by the adoption of this section, if the National Guard organizations in the future are drafted into the service of the United States, that immediately they are discharged they shall begin operation again under their enlistment as National Guard in the various States from which they came. The committee felt that this was an exceedingly important provision, and that it ought to be adopted.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. The amendment, however, provides that the length of service as the guardsman renders to the Federal Government shall be counted on his period of enlistment in the National Guard.

Mr. KAHN. That is very true.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I ask for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The language in the bill was "shall be held to service in the National Guard," and so forth.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think that is not in the proposition now proposed—that is, in that language.

Mr. KAHN. It is not put into the——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That would put a man back into the National Guard who had been discharged because a leg was lost.

Mr. KAHN. The amendment proposed to put a man who has been discharged from his Federal service back into the National Guard for the balance of the period of his National Guardsman enlistment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, is it regardless of what he is discharged for? He might be discharged because he had been stealing and court-martialed.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, if he has been discharged for any reason of that kind he would not go back into the National Guard.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. He would under the terms of the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If my colleague will allow me, that deals with the discharge from the service of the unit and not the personnel.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It says, "drafted from the military service." It does not make any difference how he is discharged.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I was not present at the committee meeting this morning when this committee amendment was agreed to. The proposition covered by this amendment, however, was discussed in the committee one day when I was present. The trouble with the amendment is that the drafters of the amendment have forgotten we have a Constitution, or at least they have disregarded it whether they have forgotten it or not. The Constitution of the United States provides that the militia shall be forever under the control of the States, and the National Guard is about all the militia we have. Now, this amendment seeks to put the militia in the Army and when you get through give it back to the States. You can not do that under the Constitution. When the United States Government wants the militia, we draft it and take it away from the States. We can draft a man because he has blue eyes or because he has red hair, or because he is 6 feet 2 inches tall, or for any other reason we please. We have a perfect right to say that we will draft every man enlisted in the National Guard and we will take them, but we have not any constitutional authority to do what this amendment proposes to do.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. In a moment. If you pass this amendment, you are going to destroy the National Guard section of the national-defense act. You have already torn up the Army, you have thrown away your reserves and refused to train your citizenry, and now under this amendment you are trying to destroy the National Guard. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKEOWN. Do the National Guard members have any choice under this proposed amendment to express their wishes as to whether they shall go into the Army or not?

Mr. CALDWELL. No.

Mr. McKEOWN. Do not they do that now?

Mr. CALDWELL. As I was saying——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will permit, when a man is enlisted in the National Guard for his first enlistment and subsequent reenlistments he takes a dual oath to support his State and the National Government.

Mr. CALDWELL. He takes a dual oath that he will support either one——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Both.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; but the trouble is the oath is unconstitutional, too.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But it seemed to work first rate——

Mr. CALDWELL. Because the men who joined the National Guard did so because if there was going to be fighting they were willing to stand by their oath, but there is not anything in the Constitution——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I have yielded over here.

Mr. McKEOWN. I want to know whether or not this amendment would preclude giving an opportunity to the national guardsman to make his election when he went into the national service?

Mr. CALDWELL. As I understand this amendment it provides, first, that when a man gets into the National Guard he takes a dual oath, and when we get into war he will be drafted by the President and put into the war. When he gets through with the war, whether he has been fed up in the service or not, it makes no difference whether his condition has changed and he is needed at home, he goes back to the National Guard whether he will or no, and I say that is unconstitutional, and you are destroying the National Guard in trying to do it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I was inclined to think just what the gentleman has just said in reference to the original provision of the bill. The National Government can not determine about enlistments in the National Guard or service?

Mr. CALDWELL. No, sir.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But when we read the amendment which was offered that did rather cover the subject——

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not think it does. I am of the opinion the amendment would make the whole National Guard organization unconstitutional. If this House wants to destroy the National Guard, they can vote for the amendment.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to be interrupted during my five minutes.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I shall oppose this bill and, if I have the opportunity and can get recognition for that purpose, I shall make a motion to recommit it to the Committee on Military Affairs. I would like, therefore, at this time to state specifically some of the reasons why it is impossible for me to support this measure in its present form. They are as follows:

First. Under this bill the composition of each arm and branch of the service is left to executive authority, the surrender of a right Congress has heretofore always exercised.

Second. The bill fixes the total number of officers, leaving their assignment with restrictions as to the total number in each arm or branch to War Department discretion.

Third. The bill gives a much larger number of officers to the General Staff in Washington than any exigency in peace can possibly require.

Fourth. The number of officers provided for in the bill is far beyond the increase in the enlisted strength.

Fifth. The percentage of higher officers is too large. It provides for 4 per cent of colonels and 4½ per cent lieutenant colonels, whereas 2 per cent and 2½ per cent would be sufficient.

Sixth. The difference in the number of officers under this bill and the Senate bill, which provides for universal compulsory training, is only 348.

Seventh. The staff corps or department provisions simply fix the number of officers in grades from highest to lowest, so that one corps or department may be overloaded with officers of high rank and another with subordinate officers. To illustrate—not that I am charging that it will be done—in The Adjutant General's Department there are 100 officers in grades from colonel to captain. Under this section—and it applies to the other sections of the bill—there may be 96 colonels, 1 lieutenant colonel, 1 major, and 1 captain. This may not be done, but why grant such authority which may result in favoritism? This authority may apply to the Judge Advocate General's Department, the Inspector General's Department, the Ordnance, the Signal Corps, and so forth, and so on.

Eighth. When we reach the sections relating to the Infantry, Cavalry, and Field and Coast Artillery we find that the total number of officers and men is fixed in each grade from the highest to the lowest, but with authority in the War Department to organize one at the expense of the other and to fix a large number of higher rank in one branch of the service to the detriment of another. Under this bill the Infantry has 4,200 officers in grades from colonel to second lieutenant. The Infantry could be organized so as to have 1 colonel, 1 lieutenant colonel, 1 major, and all of the other 4,200 officers as captains, first and second lieutenants, provided there are sufficient places for the total number of colonels.

Ninth. Then we reach section 23 with its provisions for filling vacancies, providing for promotions, the classification of officers, and so forth; we find it is as long as the moral law, and I doubt if anyone really understands its effect. The single list is a beautiful idea, and if it could be put into practical effect I would support it. You can not correct the inequalities of the past. If a single list is ideal, then let it begin from now on, so as to give promotion according to length of service.

Tenth. I have some objections to the miscellaneous sections, but I understand the committee will offer amendments to correct them. I also object to several other features of the bill, but it is unnecessary now to mention them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that if I get recognition for the purpose of offering a motion to recommit the bill, I should like very much to make a specific motion providing specific objections to the bill, but I find when I undertake to write a motion of that kind that there are so many specific objections that I would be undertaking to rewrite the bill in the form of a motion to recommit, and I therefore think that it is far better that the bill be sent back to the Committee on Military Affairs of the House for further consideration. I have concluded at the present time that that is a better form of motion. and if the House should happen to adopt it every Member who votes to recommit would not thereby be confessing that the balance of the bill is correct. I shall move to recommit the bill at the proper time to the Committee on Military Affairs of the House in view of the various objections that I have to many of its features. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I shall not detain the committee, but I want to call your attention to the matter suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] on the amendment that is now pending in relation to the National Guard. The purpose of that amendment is to aid the National Guard. Under the law we have the power to call a National Guard regiment into the service. When the war is over they are discharged from the service, and in many of the States we found ourselves without any National Guard. The national guardsmen of a number of the States are desirous of having this done, but, after all, the power will remain in the States. But I do feel that as a matter of courtesy to the members of the National Guard who are called into the Federal service, while they are serving their country their places ought not to be taken by other officers who may be commissioned by the governor in their absence, and when they come back find their places taken. I feel that they should have the option, at least; that is all this does.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. HARRELD. Where do you get your authority for saying that when the National Guard are mustered out of the Federal service they are also then mustered out of the National Guard?

Mr. McKENZIE. I am not talking about the authority. I am merely stating the fact that this was done.

Mr. HARRELD. Unless there is a provision to that effect in the national defense act——

Mr. CRAGO. They stand discharged.

Mr. HARRELD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I can see the importance of this amendment, and I shall vote for it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois to state whether he is familiar with the decision of the Supreme Court in construing the provision of the Constitution of the United States, which prescribes that the powers of Congress are, among other things, "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress"? I will ask the gentleman if that opinion of Mr. Justice Washington does not oppose, flat-footed, this proposition?

Mr. McKENZIE. That was before the national defense act was passed; but we decided to pass what we deemed to be a practical military program, regardless of the decisions of the Supreme Court or anybody else, and in my judgment we acted properly.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman no doubt will remember that in the Sixty-fourth Congress, when the Hay bill was under consideration, the question was raised, with Mr. Secretary of War Garrison before the committee, as to whether or not this Congress had the authority to do this very thing that you are trying to do with this amendment, and it was there agreed by that committee that we could not do it, and consequently we passed the statute as it appears in section 111 of the national defense act.

Mr. McKENZIE. I ask unanimous consent to insert, as a part of my remarks, two letters bearing on the subject of military service.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to insert the letters referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the letters referred to:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Wednesday, March 17, 1920.

Maj. Gen. HARRY L. ROGERS, Quartermaster General,
Director of Purchase and Storage, United States Army,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: 1. As you know, the Secretary of War has recently reiterated his previous recommendations that all construction work for the Army should be turned over to the Corps of Engineers in the reorganization bills now under consideration by Congress. Your views are requested for presentation to the military committees of the Senate and House upon this matter.

2. It is regarded as advisable to have this work of construction and the major maintenance work involving important alterations of structures placed under the Corps of Engineers, in order to prevent overlapping and duplication of construction activities in peace and war, and to furnish this most valuable means of training for our Engineer officers in peace for their construction duties in war. It is believed that this work should be turned over to the Corps of Engineers and the operation of utilities left with the various services principally concerned therein; for instance, the utilities within the arsenals by commanding officers thereof, those within the posts, such as bakeries, fire protection, laundries, and so on, by the post quartermaster, as was done previous to the war.

3. I am firmly convinced that the consolidation of the various activities of transportation, motor transport, finance, and operation of utilities at posts under the Quartermaster will be far more advantageous and economical than the present multiplicity of agencies with their unnecessary overhead and expense.

Yours, respectfully,
LANSING H. BEACH,
Major General, Chief of Engineers.

MARCH 17, 1920.

Maj. Gen. LANSING H. BEACH,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I am pleased to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 17th instant, in which you voice the opinion that the consolidation of the various activities of transportation, motor transport, finance, and the operation of utilities at posts, under the Quartermaster Corps, will be far more advantageous and economical to the Government than would be the separation of these activities, with the consequent unnecessary overhead expense.

I have carefully considered the suggestion contained in the second paragraph of your letter, and in view of the recent recommendation of the Secretary of War, I am of the opinion that the interests of the service will be as well served if all original and new projects of construction work formerly carried on by the Quartermaster Corps and lately by the construction division were turned over to the Engineer Corps. This would leave with the Quartermaster Corps the handling of all utilities and maintenance at Army posts and depots and other activities of the Quartermaster Corps.

For the sake of economy and the utilization of supplies and personnel already available in the Quartermaster Corps at Army posts, depots, and other activities of the Quartermaster Corps, it is deemed essential that maintenance and repairs and utilities at such places should be, as heretofore, included in the duties of the Quartermaster Corps.

The necessity for the operation of utilities being left with the bureau or service responsible for the activity is beyond argument. The functions which have been recently ascribed to utilities officers of the construction division are absolutely essential at both arsenals of the Ordnance Department and depots of the Quartermaster Corps, as part of the responsibility of the commanding officers thereof in the economical and efficient management of their plants.

Yours, respectfully,

H. L. ROGERS,
Quartermaster General, United States Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 50. That said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting after section 127 a new section, to be numbered 127a, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 127a. Miscellaneous provisions: Hereafter no detail or assignment of an officer shall carry advanced rank, except as otherwise specifically provided herein.

"Officers now carried as additional numbers shall be included in the numbers provided for by this act, and shall no longer be additional, and any officer hereafter appointed, under the provisions of law, to a grade in which no vacancy exists, shall be an additional number in that grade until absorbed, and no longer.

"In time of war retired officers may be employed on active duty, in the discretion of the President, and when so employed they shall receive the full pay and allowances of their grades.

"The President is authorized to detail not more than five officers of the Medical Department for duty with the military relief division of the American National Red Cross.

"Authority is hereby given to the Secretary of War to grant permission, by revocable license, to the American National Red Cross to erect and maintain on any military reservations within the jurisdiction of the United States buildings suitable for the storage of supplies, or to occupy for that purpose buildings erected by the United States, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, such supplies to be available for the aid of the civilian population in case of serious national disaster.

"In determining relative rank and increase of pay for length of service, and, in the case of officers of the Regular Army, in determining rights of retirement, active duty performed while under appointment from the United States Government, whether in the Regular, provisional, or temporary forces, shall be credited to the same extent as service under a Regular Army commission.

"In time of war any officer of the Regular Army may be appointed to higher temporary rank without vacating his permanent commission, but all other appointments of officers in time of war shall be in the Officers' Reserve Corps.

"Unless special assignment is made by the President under the provisions of the one hundred and nineteenth article of war, officers of the Regular Army holding temporary commissions in any grade, and reserve officers on active duty in that grade, shall all take rank according to date, which, in the case of an officer of the Regular Army, is that stated in his commission, and, in the case of a reserve officer, is that on which he was placed on active duty in that grade. When dates of rank are the same, relative rank shall be determined by length of active commissioned service as an officer of the United States, and when length of commissioned service is the same, by age.

"Any officer of the Regular Army who has held the permanent grade of colonel on the active or retired list and who has heretofore held a higher grade than that of colonel in the temporary forces of the United States during the World War may, in the discretion of the President, when retired, have the rank and retired pay of the grade next higher than that held by him in the Regular Army at the time of his retirement.

"Hereafter any retired officer who has been or shall be detailed on active duty shall receive the rank, pay, and allowances of the grade, not above that of colonel, that he would have attained in due course of promotion if he had remained on the active list for a period beyond the date of his retirement equal to the total amount of time during which he has been detailed to active duty since his retirement.

"When any member of the National Guard becomes entitled, for a continuous period of less than one month, to Federal pay at the rates fixed for the Regular Army, whether by virtue of a call by the President, of attendance at school or maneuvers, or of any other cause, he shall receive such pay for each day of such period, and the thirty-first day of a calendar month shall not be excluded from the computation."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 62, line 11, after the word "detail," insert "rating."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report another committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 62, line 12, after the word "herein," insert "Provided, That in lieu of the 50 per cent increase of pay provided for in this act any officer or enlisted man upon whom the rating of junior military aviator, or military aviator, has heretofore been conferred for having specially distinguished himself in time of war in active operations against the enemy shall, while on duty which requires him to participate regularly and frequently in aerial flights, continue to have the rank, pay, and allowances and additional pay provided by the act of June 3, 1916, and the act of July 24, 1917."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to allow six or seven officers in aviation who have earned these ranks in actual conflict with enemy fliers to continue under the proposed law with their rank and extra allowances.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Are these sections of the law repealed by this act?

Mr. KAHN. Yes. There are only eight officers involved.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understand; but the language of the amendment would not give them what the gentleman wants to do. I move to insert the word "now."

Mr. KAHN. I accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman indicate where that could be inserted?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This act, when it takes effect, repeals these former provisions. If you refer to these acts, what you mean to refer to are these acts which existed before they were amended; but they are still acts after they are amended. They may not both be amended.

Mr. KAHN. Those acts provided for this additional rank and pay for these flying officers who came into actual conflict with enemy flyers.

Of course, the war being over, there will be no other officers of that rank created.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Really the effect of the thing is that certain men have under existing law been given a grade from which they will be demoted if this bill passes without amendment.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; unless this amendment is agreed to.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Therefore, this amendment is simply intended to prevent the demotion of the only people who apparently, from our study of the subject, will be demoted by the passage of this bill.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield the floor?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN of Illinois to the committee amendment: Insert after the word "pay" in the next to the last line of the committee amendment the word "now."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, during the consideration of this bill I have been somewhat active in debate and have occupied the floor rather frequently, but my course has been dictated by a sincere desire to contribute what I might to framing a measure which while meeting the military needs of the United States would make more democratic the Army, would not place onerous and oppressive taxation upon the people, nor would contain the germs of the military spirit which too often in the history of the past has begotten dreams of conquest or established military caste or inspired devotion to warlike ambitions. It has been deeply gratifying to me that five amendments to the bill proposed by me so appealed to the judgment of the House that they were approved and adopted.

As we are now about to come to a vote upon the measure, I solicit your indulgence that I may briefly point out the course which, it seems to me, is sanctioned by wisdom and the national welfare. Under the terms of the bill authorization is made for an Army of 299,000 enlisted men and 17,820 officers, and 1,575 warrant officers constituting a grade between the enlisted men and officers. The total authorized strength of the Army if fully recruited would be 318,395 officers and men.

It is estimated that the maintenance of such a force will cost the United States from $450,000,000 to $600,000,000. This sum equals one-half of all of the annual expenditures of the Government of the United States prior to the war, including the maintenance of the Army, the Navy, the Coast Guard, the Government departments, and all of the varied activities of the Federal Government.

My own view is that the bill should be returned to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions to the committee to report a bill so drawn as to provide for an Army of not exceeding 200,000 enlisted men and not exceeding 14,000 officers. A reduction in personnel of that magnitude will save to the people of the United States annually $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 in taxes. The grinding burdens of taxation are even now, though borne cheerfully and patriotically by the mass of our people, proving hazardous to the commerce, industry, and agriculture of the United States. The staggering sums expended in the prosecution of the war constitute a debt of honor and must be repaid. The billions of dollars borrowed from the people of the United States by the sale of Liberty bonds must be redeemed with interest by the Government. Each Liberty bond, whether owned by the rich investor or purchased by the citizen of modest means as an act of patriotism at the sacrifice of comfort and convenience, each war-savings stamp of the frugal housewife, each thrift stamp of the ragged little newsboy, bears upon its face the solemn covenant of our country. That covenant as to everyone, even unto the utmost penny, must be fulfilled. The Government must, of course, raise the necessary funds for the redemption of its debts by taxation. With this great volume of indebtedness to be discharged, the most rigid economy should be practiced by the Congress in appropriating the public moneys.

Is it not worth while to save $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 to the taxpayers? Let me ask the Republican leader, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who has repeatedly announced that his party, now in control of both the House and Senate, stands for economy in public expenditures, if a clear-cut, tangible, apparent, and real saving of $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 annually would not afford more convincing proof of economy than mere verbal professions, mere declarations, and high-sounding phrases unaccompanied by acts of real retrenchment?

An Army of 200,000 enlisted men and 14,000 officers will provide a military force larger than any ever heretofore provided in time of peace in the history of the Republic. Under the national defense act of 1916, enacted when war threatened, a peace-time Army of only 175,000 men was authorized. An Army of 200,000 men and 14,000 officers will constitute a force almost twice as large as the size of the Army actually in service at the outbreak of the war. Then the world was in arms, with drums beating and flags fluttering; now it lies battered and bleeding from its suppurating wounds. With the nations of Europe struggling desperately to maintain themselves even in peace, with their resources paralyzed and wasted, with their credit so shattered as to render difficult the reestablishment of their industries, to say nothing of maintaining war establishments, there is little portent that America and her sons will soon be challenged to grasp their weapons and march out on the fighting fields to defend American rights.

An Army of 200,000 men and 14,000 officers will provide a force entirely sufficient to police our overseas possessions, defend the Mexican border, man the coast defenses, and garrison the Panama Canal Zone, and insure an ample number of men and officers to train the National Guard and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps at the approved schools and colleges, and a force will always be at hand commensurate with the national needs in times of peace.

The World War demonstrated that no great power can depend solely upon its regular army in time of war. The reserve, composed of the entire man power of the Nation of military age, must ever constitute the great reservoir of strength upon which the United States must rely if ever again it should become engaged at arms with one of the great powers. Germany and Russia and France, though each maintained large standing armies prior to 1914, found that such forces, though great as compared to those of Great Britain and the United States, could not meet their military needs in the martial contest that devastated the continent of Europe and hungrily devoured millions of men. They had to fall back upon their reserves. Just as the United States wisely resorted to the draft on the declaration of war, so it must once more if ever another issue of such moment or a danger so imminent as those we then faced shall force us again to draw the sword. It is absolutely impracticable to maintain a standing army commensurate with war purposes without establishing a military system as odious and intolerable as those against which we have hurled our thundering denunciations since first our institutions were fashioned and our political ideals defined.

Then it may be said that the functions of the army in peace time are to defend the border posts, police the overseas possessions, garrison the Panama Canal Zone, man the coast fortifications, train the National Guard and the reserve, and afford a nucleus around which a larger force may be built up when a threat of war may appear. These purposes may be properly served by an army of the proportions already indicated.

There are objections to details of the bill other than the size of the force authorized which may with justice be urged. One feature to which attention is directed is the increase in officers in the higher grades—colonels and generals. Under its specific terms there shall be 21 major generals of the line and 11 of the staff, and 46 brigadier generals of the line and 14 of the staff. Among this number are 22 staff positions carrying with them the rank of general officer, which may be filled by appointment of colonels of the line or the staff instead of detailing general officers for such duties. It will thus be observed that 92 general officers may be appointed. Under the present law only 60 are authorized. Ten major generals are to be designated as commanders of divisions, when, gentlemen of the House, in times of peace there will probably never be mobilized at one place a force of more than one-half a division.

However, the 10 division commanders will receive the rank, pay, and emoluments of office, though the divisions which they are theoretically to command may be scattered throughout a half-dozen Army posts. So it is with 18 brigadier generals who are provided to command brigades. Before the war, I am told, there were only three posts in the United States at which organizations as large as a brigade were stationed. Yet the bill creates 18 brigadier generals to command brigades which in part will exist only on paper. Few of the division and brigade commanders will have any useful service or function to perform. The bill should have provided that such officers, when not in actual command of divisions or brigades mobilized at posts or operating as tactical units in the field or in training, should be detailed as chiefs of bureaus, for other staff duty, or duty at the Army service schools where the junior officers are to be trained and instructed. The division and brigade commanders mentioned do not include the 9 major generals who are to command territorial departments. To anyone who has served in the Army it will not be necessary to suggest that each time a general is created by law two other commissioned officers must be created to act as his aids-de-camp. Their chief duties are more of a personal and social character than of a military nature. When one general officer is created, not only are two aids also to be created, but under existing military practice enlisted men must be found to act as orderlies to the general and his aids. Other officers will likewise be detailed to act as division and brigade staff officers. The increase in the number of major generals and brigadier generals builds up an expensive and ceremonious overhead machinery larger than can profitably be employed. I also cite the fact that the bill largely increases the percentage of field officers over previous military legislation. I call attention to the following table appearing in the report of the committee:

The following table shows for purposes of comparison the percentages in each field grade and the total for all field grades:

	Line of Army at present.	Medical Corps at present.	Corps of Engineers at present.	This bill.
	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
Colonel	2.6	3.2	4.6	4.0
Lieutenant colonel	2.9	5.4	6.0	4.5
Major	7.7	23.7	14.3	15.0
Total field grades	13.2	32.3	24.9	23.5

It will be seen that as to line officers the percentage of colonels is increased from 2.6 per cent to 4 per cent, of lieutenant colonels from 2.9 per cent to 4.5 per cent, and of majors from 7.7 per cent to 15 per cent. Including both line and staff, under the present law the percentage of colonels in the Army was less than 3 per cent; under this bill it is 4 per cent. Under the present law the percentage of lieutenant colonels is 3½ per cent; under this bill 4½ per cent. Under the present law the percentage of majors is about 11 per cent; under the proposed bill 15 per cent.

The bill provides for something like 17,820 officers. Under the present law the commissioned personnel of the Army is 11,445 officers. This is an increase of about 60 per cent in the number of officers, although the enlisted strength of the Army is increased only by 75,000 men, an increase of about 42 per cent. Not including the Medical Department, the bill provides for 599 colonels, 674 lieutenant colonels, and 2,245 majors. Under existing law only 337 colonels are authorized. It will become apparent upon examination that the larger increase in officers is in the grades above captain.

As to many of the other details of the bill, I have heretofore during the debate on amendments given expression to my views, and I shall not here restate them, but shall be content with the submission of these observations as to the general policy and features of the proposed legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, the people of the United States are willing to bear any burdens or suffer any sacrifice necessary for the defense or the safety of their country. They have during the recent past, on a stage where all the world might witness their actions, given immutable and irrefragable testimony to their patriotism and attachment to their country. But, Mr. Chairman, it is our duty, as their servants, to lighten those burdens as measurably and invoke those sacrifices as sparingly as may be done without impairment of the national defense. A wise and prudent policy of economy in public expenditures should ever actuate the Congress, but at this critical period such a course is imperative, if serious consequences are to be averted. Let me plead with you to keep in the Treasury the $150,000,000 or $200,000,000 which may be safely cut from the Army Establishment for the next fiscal year. Decreased appropriations will in time enable the Congress to lower the taxes—something for which the country is anxiously looking.

Gentlemen who declaim against extravagance, who fervently protest belief in and affection for economy, I invite you to embrace this opportunity to save at least $150,000,000 to the people of the United States. Here is a plain, concrete example capable of mathematical demonstration. The Republican leader has loudly in the House, and spaciously in the newspapers, proclaimed that this Congress under his guidance would retrench and reduce appropriations. While the echoes of his strident and insistent tones in behalf of economy still linger in this Hall he scatters their pleasing memories by his vote for this bill.

In any sudden and unexpected conflict with a powerful nation the Navy must in the very nature of things, by reason of our geographical location and separation by water from the strong and militant powers, always constitute our "first line of defense." With an enemy held at bay for a time we may mobilize and prepare the reserve land forces to meet an emergency. Today the American Navy is second only to that of Great Britain, and if the 1916 program of naval construction is to be completed, by the end of 1924 we may expect to possess a Navy which, in strength, in fighting power, in efficiency as an engine of war, shall have no superior upon the seven seas. With this majestic and mighty marine patrolling the highways where the law of the road is force and the code of conduct is prowess, we may not tremble nor yet be afraid lest any flag that flies shall command greater respect or its folds shall insure greater security to its nationals than that for whose violation on the high seas America shot the thunderbolts of her wrath against our late enemy from Cantigny and Chateau-Thierry and Soissons and St. Mihiel and all the brilliant battles in which our troops participated to that crushing climax amidst the forests and hills and valleys and ravines of the Argonne, where American boys with American bayonets in their hands set the American flag so high that monarchs can not fail to see it, and, seeing it, to respect it, and so covered it with glory and wrapped it in radiance that men in the silent and distant corners of the earth will adore it and bless it and venerate it.

Let us recommit this bill with instructions to the committee to bring back a bill carrying not over 200,000 enlisted men and 14,000 officers, and cutting from the Military Establishment one-third of its entire cost, and say to the world that we are going back to peace and not to war. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I know that some Army officers think that it is no more dangerous to go up in the air in a flying machine than it is to serve in some other branches of the Army. I think that the man who serves in the flying service is in the most hazardous occupaton in the world at this time. I notice one gentleman shaking his head; he would not do it himself.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I did not refer to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I want to say that the records of the War Department show that the casualties to lieutenants in the Infantry were greater than the casualties of the flying officers. That is why I was shaking my head.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am sorry the gentleman has taken up so much of my time, but perhaps I can get more, for I have something that I want to say. I repeat the statement, however. I do not think it would be fair myself, after Congress has invited these men to enter the flying service—and it is voluntary on their part—on a certain basis of pay, to then sneakingly take it away from them. [Applause.] I am not a welsher myself, no matter what it costs. I do not believe in the Government welshing on its obligations, even if it takes a little money. [Applause.]

The other day an Army officer went up in a flying machine somewhere in Ohio, I believe. I can not give the officer's name.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Maj. Shroeder.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. He went up 5 miles in height and nearly lost his life. It seemed to me when I read it that it was an unquestionably foolhardy thing to do, and as I did not suppose that this service would be engaged in any unnecessarily useless hazardous experiment, I made some inquiry about it. What I learned was this: Everyone knows that it is not possible to run a boat in the water at the rate of 60 miles an hour because of the resistance of the water. Everyone knows that it is quite possible to run an airplane in the air at a much higher rate than 60 miles an hour, and the reason is because there is so much less resistance in the air than there is in the water. Now, it might be supposed that what I will term the "kick," being similar in both cases, would have the same effect. But the fact is that it is possible for an engine to run much faster in the air, owing to the less resistance in the air, than it is in the water, owing to the greater resistance of the water.

As we get higher the air becomes thinner and has less resistance. These aeroplane men have developed this theory, which may prove practical. They believe that if we can get up high enough in the air, where the air is less dense, it will be possible to very greatly increase the speed, with the same motive power. The difficulty is that when you get high in the air, owing to the thinness of the air and the lack of oxygen, it is not easy to keep the gasoline sufficiently furnished with oxygen. To overcome this they have developed a little engine which operates from the exhaust of the gas engine, and which runs at a rapidity of 2,000 or so revolutions to the minute, which condenses the air and furnishes a sufficient amount of oxygen, and while the air at that height is extremely cold and it would not be possible, under conditions now existing in the construction of airships, for men to live and travel there, yet it is the belief, not merely the hope, that if they can make the ascent in these machines to a height of a number of miles, it will be possible, owing to the decrease in the density of the air, not to go at a speed of 100 miles an hour but at a speed of from five to six hundred miles an hour, and that it will be possible to construct planes which can operate at that height where people will be protected from the cold. I have watched the Air Service pretty closely ever since it began, and I do not doubt, old, crippled-up man that I am, that I shall live to see the day when you can eat breakfast in New York and luncheon in London. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not now in order. Debate is closed on the amendment to the amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont is recognized.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to trespass upon the patience of the House with a long explanation of this matter, but our friend from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] has volunteered the information that the committee has written this bill with certain individuals in mind and has disregarded wholly, apparently, its duty to legislate for an institution and not for men. I do not know what ouija board he has been fingering which brought him that message; but, as far as I am concerned, I do not so understand our policy or action.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. If that were not true, why is it necessary to bring in an amendment? Why did you not fix this in the bill when you drew it?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am going to show the gentleman, because, not being omniscient, and not having the gentleman's ouija board, we overlooked a few things.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is remarkable.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will turn to the law that is known as Public No. 29, approved July 24, 1917—and, by the way, that is the $640,000,000 aviation bill which we passed at that time—and will turn to section 6 of that act he will find that the law there set up this language:

No person shall receive the rating of military aviator or military aeronaut until he shall have served creditably for three years as an aviation officer with the rating of junior military aviator, or the rating of junior military aeronaut, except that in time of war any officer or enlisted man—who specially distinguished himself in active service may, on the recommendation of the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, be rated as a junior military aviator or a junior military aeronaut without regard to examination or the length of service.

And there was no favoritism business about that—

And there are several other similar provisions involved in that law. What happened? Certain men were so cited and so promoted under the terms of this law which this House passed. They were given a wholly authorized grade with its emoluments, and were given it on the terms of the specific exception to the general rule, that they had distinguished themselves in the service.

I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] that men in the line, infantrymen, cavalrymen, and others no doubt distinguished themselves, but the law did not provide such a special reward for those men, unhappily. This it did provide, and this in good faith these men took. The question now is whether the Government's good faith is to continue, or whether when they have earned it under the terms laid down in this law, we are to turn around and say, "Oh, well, in making the Army over now we will disregard any promise under which you gained something at the risk of your life."

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. OLNEY. It is a fact, of course, that aviation is most dangerous in war, but is it not also true that it is the most hazardous form of training in the Army in time of peace?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; I think it is regarded as the most dangerous in the training period.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. But the fact is that the records furnished by the War Department show the percentage of battle casualties among Infantry officers, company officers, was greater than it was among the aviators. Is not that true?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I understand that it is true, or that that is the effect of those figures; but that, of course, does not enter into this.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. No; that is just in response to the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. OLNEY] that it is the most hazardous in time of war.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Every arm of the service prides itself upon being that.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. But the records show that the percentage of battle casualties is higher among the Infantry officers than among the aviators.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; I know. But the gentleman also is mathematician enough to understand that it all depends upon the base upon which you reckon your figures and ratio. If a man has one cow and gets one more he has made a gain of 100 per cent, and yet he may not have so many cows all told as another man who has only three and who did not make any gain at all.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. But the percentage is the same.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is if it is figured on the same base.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HICKS). The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate that every time the question of aviation comes up there is an effort made to prevent the Congress of the United States from holding a forward step that has been taken by the Congress. When we declared war we had practically no air service. Gen. Pershing has testified that the few planes that we had were wrecked on the Mexican border, and that there were very few aviators in the Army.

Congress, in the national defense act in 1916, created the special aviation ratings to encourage officers and enlisted men to enter this hazardous service. In the act of July 24, 1917, Congress provided additional inducements and these special ratings were given to those aviators who specially distinguished themselves in active service against the enemy. This was a distinct promise of reward offered by the Congress. A special board of officers was appointed to pass on the qualification and merits of flying officers who had distinguished themselves in action, and awards were made. The Air Service was then, and is now, the most hazardous of all services. The death rate for battle and accidents among flying officers who served overseas was over five and one-half times that of officers of all other services. It is the most dangerous of services in training as well as in active combat.

We have heard it stated repeatedly that our men at the beginning of the war, as well as throughout the war, were compelled to fly in "flaming coffins." The development of the aerial plane in this country has been sadly neglected. Congress knew that something had to be done and something extraordinary in the shape of reward had to be offered to induce men to go into this line of service. It was a distinct obligation on the part of Congress to the officers and enlisted men of the Army who entered the Air Service. In other words, these officers and enlisted men who as aviators had distinguished themselves in action were promised that they would be rated as junior military aviators or military aviators, and that that rating would carry the increases of pay or rank stipulated in the law. The officers and men who in good faith complied with the terms of the law should not now have the rating taken away from them. Those who entered this service sacrificed all insurance except the small amount which was later provided for under the war-risk insurance act. An officer or enlisted man who had a family had obligations which were sacred to him to see that they were taken care of. The increase of pay and additional rank was a compensation to him and enabled him to carry out the sacred obligations in looking after his family which he lost when he sacrificed his insurance. I hope that this committee will not go back on the pledge which was made to these men. Out of the 33 that were decorated only 8 are left in the service. The others have either resigned or have lost their lives. I beg of you, do not take away this war decoration. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the committee as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, there are several more committee amendments.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, on the next amendment to strike out the paragraph beginning with line 9, on page 64, I am offering a perfecting amendment to the paragraph, but let the amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 64, line 9, strike out all down to and including line 16.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 64, line 11, after the word "who," strike out the words "has heretofore" and insert "On December 1, 1918"; line 12, after the word "States," strike out "during the World War"; line 14, after the word "grade," insert the words "not above that of brigadier general," so that as amended the paragraph will read:

"Any officer of the Regular Army who has held the permanent grade of colonel on the active or retired list and who, on December 1, 1918, held a higher grade than that of colonel in the temporary forces of the United States may, in the discretion of the President, when retired, have the rank and pay of the grade not above that of brigadier general next higher than that held by him in the Regular Army at the time of his retirement."

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question, so that I may understand the gentleman's amendment? Why does the gentleman fix the time of December 1, 1918, rather than November 11, 1918?

Mr. CRAGO. For the following reason: There were several cases where they thought it would be unfair to grant this additional grade to men who were tried out as brigadier generals, who were some of the younger colonels, but who were demoted because of the fact that their service had not been entirely satisfactory as brigade commanders. But these demotions were all prior to December 1, 1918; some of these demotions had not been made November 11, 1918.

Mr. CALDWELL. Was one of those the case of a man—a brigadier general—whose stars were taken off him on the boat coming from France to the United States?

Mr. CRAGO. No, sir; none of the men, as far as I know, who gave satisfactory service were reduced in rank prior to December 1, 1918.

Mr. CALDWELL. Now, were these reductions the gentleman refers to made by the commander in chief in France or were they made by the Chief of Staff in the United States?

Mr. CRAGO. They were made in France. The Chief of Staff in the United States would have nothing to do with promotions or demotions on the other side.

Mr. CALDWELL. But he did demote a man coming across on the boat?

Mr. CRAGO. I will say to the gentleman this amendment would not include any man demoted as he indicates. None were brought back before that time.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for information?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois When a major general in the Army is retired it is not intended to retire him at the grade of a brigadier?

Mr. CRAGO. No, sir.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Would not that be the effect of the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. CRAGO. This does not affect any officer in the Army except a man who held the permanent grade of colonel.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But at some time he held the permanent grade of colonel; any man who gets to be major general has usually held that grade?

Mr. CRAGO. He shall have the rank and retired pay of the grade not above that of brigadier next higher than that held by him.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Any man who has been a colonel and who is retired afterwards with certain provisions shall have the grade not higher than brigadier general——

Mr. CRAGO. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is what it says.

Mr. CRAGO. Not above that of brigadier general next higher than that held by him in the Regular Army at the time of his retirement.

Now, if he was a major general at the time of his retirement he would retire as a major general; if he was a brigadier general at the time of his retirement, he would retire as a brigadier general, notwithstanding the provisions of this act; but if he was only a colonel at the time of his retirement he could retire one grade higher, namely, that of brigadier general.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I can see what the gentleman wants to accomplish, and very likely he may be right about it. That is not the way it reads to me. It says that any man who has held the grade of colonel when retired shall have rank and retired pay of the grade not above brigadier general, next higher than that held by him. That says he can not be retired at a higher grade than brigadier general. Now, that is what the gentleman wants to do, but it includes everybody who has had a permanent grade of colonel.

Mr. CRAGO. I will say if such a construction could be put on it and this section would be left in the bill, I would be glad to change it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know what the Comptroller of the Treasury would do, but that is what it says. It is usually advisable to make these things so clear that it is easy to determine what they mean.

Mr. CRAGO. I think the paragraph as amended says exactly what I meant.

I want to say these few words: Of course, I intend to support this Army bill, not because I believe in all the provisions of it but because I think it is a great step in advance of anything we have ever had. And I want to say in answer to some of the criticisms made here that I think one of the great outstanding benefits of this bill is the increased list of officers for which we are providing in the bill, a larger list than we have heretofore carried, because the officers of the Regular Establishment are the only really permanent part of the Regular Army. They are in the Army permanently. Now, in answer to the criticism as to the number of enlisted men we have provided for in this bill, I am not fooling myself with the thought that we are going to secure that number of enlisted men during days of peace, but I do not consider that an argument, even, for our placing the number of enlisted men in the Army lower than we have placed it in this bill, for this reason, if for no other: That at the beginning of the war in Europe and for two years thereafter this Government was afraid to make any move to authorize an increase in our Army and our Navy, for fear it would be construed either by the Central Powers or some other powers as an intention on our part to get ready for war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRAGO. And that very fear on the part of our Government kept us from taking advantage of the situation that then existed.

Now, with the personnel provided in this bill we can, if the stress of events shows that we are facing danger, automatically, without any additional legislation or without any Executive action, build up a force with which we can at least begin to train an army, and that, too, without criticism on the part of any other Government, because we will be only filling up the units of an organization already authorized by law.

Now, as to other provisions in the bill. We have provided in it for relative rank for the nurses of the Army. I think that is a serious mistake. But it looks as though we would have to try it out in order to find out definitely whether it is a mistake or not. I believe we have struck a serious blow at the discipline of the Army in doing that, and I believe it can serve no good and useful purpose. But a majority of the committee thought best to insert that in the bill, and that does not prevent me from voting for the bill. I do not know what action we may take regarding some of these separate services in the Army. Whatever action we take, I am willing to vote for the bill in spite of that; and now when it comes to a section like this, which I am asking to amend, I want to say in explanation that, while I was perhaps responsible for the principle involved in the insertion of this section, I was not responsible for the language in which it was inserted, and I want to make it plain what I wanted to do, and I want it thoroughly understood by the committee what the provision would do, and then, if in the judgment of this whole committee it should not be a part of our reorganization bill, I will be content; but I want the situation clearly put before the House at this time.

Now, what does it do? The general officers of our Army, where they were not general officers already, were taken from civil life, the National Guard, or the Regular Army, but principally from the Regular Army. Men were made general officers and commanded brigades and divisions over in France and led troops in battle who had been colonels in the Regular Army for years and years and who had no chance under the ordinary course of events to ever become general officers. Many of those men were the men at the top of the list of colonels. The men who made a success of that work were in commission as general officers on December 1, 1918. The men who had not been successful had been put back for one cause or another to their former grade. Now, this provision will take care of the men who have been put on the retired list since December 1, 1918, or who will go on the retired list as colonels before they will ever have a chance under this bill to become general officers.

Now, the great majority of the colonels who were serving as brigadier generals over on the other side will under the provisions of this bill, before they reach the retirement age, have reached the grade of a general officer. All of the lieutenant colonels, practically, will have become colonels, all of the majors will have become lieutenant colonels, and all of the captains majors, and so on down the line will have their advanced grades. We are by this bill providing for practically every officer who remains in the Army, but these older men, who after years of distinguished service and who after having exercised these higher commands, are one by one being placed on the retired list, and they have no chance to take advantage of the general provisions of this bill. They gain nothing by it. And from my reading of the list, while I know none of these men personally, I am convinced, unless we insert some such section in this bill, we are going to do an injustice to some 30 or 40 colonels on the list.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the committee moved to strike out this paragraph because, upon interpreting the language, we found it conferred the right of retirement upon every colonel of the Regular Army who came to retirement age, at an advanced rank, upon every brigadier general, upon every major general, and it even gave to every man who held the rank of lieutenant colonel during the war the right to the rank of general in the Regular Army.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right at that point?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the gentleman from Kansas contend that this language would enable a major general to retire with the rank of lieutenant general?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do.

Mr. CONNALLY. There is no rank of lieutenant general in the Regular Establishment.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then it probably would not, but might be so construed; but it undoubtedly gives to these officers the right to retire at an advanced rank. I would say this in regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania

[Mr. CRAGO]: It confines this right to retire at the advanced rank to those officers who retire at the grade of a colonel.

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. And I want to remind the gentleman and the House that the Regular officers who fought in the Civil War waited 40 years before Congress conferred upon them the right to retire at an advanced grade, and I do not think we should do this at this time.

Mr. CALDWELL rose.

Mr. KAHN. I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. BLACK. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman from New York in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; I am opposed to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARRELD. I have an amendment to strike out certain words in this section. I do not know "where I am at." I want to offer an amendment to strike out certain words in this section.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman can offer the amendment, but he can not debate it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I believe the whole section ought to be stricken out, and I do not believe the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] would cure the defects that I find in the section.

It is not fair to single out a man who has been a colonel and spends his life in the Army and say, "You shall have an extra grade because of the fact that you were over there and got your promotion because of your seniority," and at the same time say to a man who was a little lower down in grade and who also was over there and who not because of seniority, but because of ability, was picked out and given a brigadier general's commission and fought the enemy and defeated him, "You must go back as a captain and not receive any recognition," as would be the case if the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania were adopted.

I have in mind two very distinguished cases. One of them was Maj. Moses, who went across and who was promoted to brigadier general. The other day he was demoted to lieutenant colonel. Another was Paul D. Malone, who went on the other side and stood in the face of the hottest fire ever faced by American forces in the history of the country, and he acquitted himself with such honor and credit that he is now recognized in the Army as one of the greatest men produced in this war. Yet under the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania he would stay lieutenant colonel.

Mr. CRAGO. Evidently the gentleman from New York did not hear my explanation of what the amendment would accomplish. Gen. Malone and Gen. Moses, undoubtedly, when they retire, will retire as brigadier generals, and I hope when they retire it will be as major generals.

Mr. CALDWELL. Oh, they are both Democrats, and they do not stand much chance of being promoted if the Republicans are successful in the next election. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAGO. Oh, they talk with too much sense to be branded in that way by the gentleman from New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALDWELL. They must have talked very little to the gentleman if they did not tell him what they were.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO].

The question was taken; and on a division (suggested by the Chair) there were—ayes 7, noes 47.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARRELD: Page 64, line 14, after the word "grade," strike out "next higher than that."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the next committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. TILSON). The gentleman from Illinois asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 2.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer another committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 65, between lines 8 and 9, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"Retired enlisted men who have served honorably as commissioned officers of the United States Army at some time between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, including those who have been placed on the retired list during the World War and who have been or may hereafter be discharged from their temporary commissions shall receive the retired pay and allowances of warrant officers on the retired list, as provided in this act."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to do justice to a fairly large number of enlisted men and noncommissioned officers of the Army who were on the retired list of the Army at the time we entered the World War. These men were called back, taken back, and commissioned as officers. They helped to train the troops. They led troops in the war. Gradually their services were no longer required, and they were discharged from their commissioned rank and went back again on the enlisted men's retired list. To take care of those men similarly situated and who still continue in the Army the bill provides for the grade of warrant officer. These retired men can not receive that recognition, and it is proposed by this amendment to put them on the retired list in the grade of a warrant officer in recognition of the splendid services they performed during the World War.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 51. That all laws and parts of laws in so far as they are inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Is it not now proper to return to those sections that we have passed over?

Mr. KAHN. We have not finished the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has read the last section of the bill.

Mr. KAHN. There is a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 65, line 10, insert a new section, "51a," as follows:

"SEC. 51a. Unless an earlier date is designated by the President, the provisions of an act entitled, 'An act authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government,' approved May 20, 1918, so far as they pertain to the Military Establishment, shall cease to be of force and effect on and after the date of the passage of this act."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this amendment is not germane to the bill. It is a provision to repeal an entirely different act, and the bill itself, according to the Chair's own ruling, is nothing else than an amendment to the Hay bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What does the gentleman say to this proposition, that in order to have this act take effect when it becomes a law certain provisions of another act must be repealed, or else you will pass nothing that has any effect?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KAHN. The purpose of this is to repeal the Overman Act, so far as it relates to the Military Establishment.

Mr. CALDWELL. I know; but a very easy way to repeal the Overman Act would be for the Senate to pass the peace treaty.

Mr. KAHN. That would not repeal it, because for six months after the proclamation of peace the Overman Act would still continue in force.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Exactly.

Mr. KAHN. And, of course, whatever we do in this bill could possibly be nullified by continuing the Overman Act in force for six months after the treaty of peace.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, we have just adopted a section providing for the repeal of all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act, and the only purpose in offering the amendment for the specific repeal of the Overman Act as affecting the Military Establishment is so that when this law is enacted it may begin to function at once, and thereby save the country hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of dollars that we are now compelled to expend under the provisions of that act.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe it will save anything, and I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, we have finished the reading of the bill, and I suggest that we return to page 22, line 16.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the section which was passed over.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That section 15 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 15. Chaplains: There shall be 1 chaplain for every 1,200 officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, exclusive of the Philippine Scouts and the unassigned recruits, authorized from time to time in accordance with law and within the peace strength authorized by this act. Chaplains shall hereafter have pay and allowances, but not rank, according to length of service, as follows: Less than 5 years, first lieutenant; 5 to 14 years, captain; 14 to 20 years, major; over 20 years, lieutenant colonel. Of the vacancies existing on July 1, 1920, such number as the President may direct shall be filled by appointment on that date of persons under the age of 54 years who served as chaplains at some time between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918. All vacancies remaining or thereafter occurring shall be filled by the appointment of persons duly accredited by some religious denomination or organization and of good standing therein between the ages of 23 and 45 years. Chaplains shall have the same rights of retirement as other officers of the Army."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 22, line 24, after the word "have," insert the word "rank" and a comma.

Mr. KAHN. I ask for a vote on that amendment.

Mr. CALDWELL. Let us have a statement about it.

Mr. KAHN. It speaks for itself. The purpose of the amendment is to give the chaplains of the Army rank. They have had rank under existing law until the Overman Act deprived them of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 22, line 25, after the word "allowances," strike out "but not rank."

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I rise in pro forma opposition to the amendment, just simply to call to the attention of the House a rather interesting experience which is not unusual here. For the last eight days during which this bill has been debated, if anything has been emphasized now and then, it is the very earnest opinion of certain gentlemen here that there is a barrier between commissioned officers and enlisted men in the Regular Army; that military rank makes that barrier; and that by men having commissioned rank and being thereafter for disciplinary purposes expected to keep at a distance from enlisted men there is an evil effect on the morale of the Army. Yet this same House, and many of the same men who advanced that idea, either publicly or privately, that commissioned rank makes an unjust social barrier between officers and enlisted men, have just now voted to maintain the rank of the one man of all men in the Army who does not need rank, because he does not have any military authority whatever, thereby establishing what gentlemen claim is a barrier between him and the enlisted men whom he is seeking to improve in their spiritual and moral character.

Mr. REAVIS. Why did not the gentleman tell us that before?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That, to my mind, is one of the most inconsistent things imaginable. Now, I want to be clearly understood about this thing. There is no question in my mind of the immeasurable value of a first-class, manly chaplain, and that he needs no rank. He is a man standing upon his own personality and his own personal power and influence over men, so that he is respected as a chaplain, with just the emblem of his divine office upon his shoulder—no more. He needs no rank, and I have known a regiment where the chaplain had more real authority down in the hearts and consciences of the soldiers than the old colonel himself. There is no question about that.

Mr. KITCHIN. Why did not the gentleman make that speech before we voted on it?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Because I have been run over by a train before, and I did not want to be trifling with one when I knew beforehand what it would do.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let the gentleman move to reconsider it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, no.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman had made the speech the vote might have been different.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Let the gentleman from North Carolina make his speech in his own time.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the gentleman and the committee who investigated the matters and got up the totals ought to tell us what is in the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Let the gentleman criticize the committee in his own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, line 7, after the figures "1918," change the period to a comma and insert "and such appointments may be made in grades above the lowest under the same restrictions as to age and rank as are hereinafter prescribed for original appointments in other branches of the service. For purposes of future promotion, persons so appointed shall be considered as having had, on the date of appointment, sufficient prior service to bring them to their respective grades under the rules of promotion established in this section."

Mr. KAHN. The purpose of that amendment is obvious—to bring the chaplains into the same relationship in the matter of promotion as other officers in the Army.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me to withdraw my amendment, which I sent to the desk, along the same line?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. UPSHAW. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee for a bit of information concerning this point. An amendment was offered during the war legislation providing for chaplains at large of the Hebrew faith.

Mr. KAHN. No; there was no amendment of that kind; there was an amendment for chaplains of representative minor denominations.

Mr. UPSHAW. The thing I want to ask now is, Is there any provision here, or has the Secretary of War the right now, to appoint a Hebrew chaplain at large?

Mr. KAHN. He has the right to appoint a chaplain of any denomination that he may see fit to appoint, but not at large. He can appoint them as chaplains of various organizations.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I was profoundly impressed a few days ago with a conversation I had with Maj. C. C. Bateman, the honored dean of the chaplains of the whole Army. He has given 30 years to service as an Army chaplain. Being a Baptist himself and trained in the foundation principles of individual responsibilty to God and the competence of each soul in religion, that grand old man told me he had witnessed with positive pain the religious loneliness of the Hebrew soldier. Whatever may be said of the many other faiths they all represent some phase of Christianity. But the Hebrew soldier, representing that splendid contingent of our citizenship that has made such a priceless contribution to our patriotism and our commercial prowess, is, as he expressed it, "neither flesh, fish, nor fowl" in the recognition of the religious life of the Army.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UPSHAW. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The Hebrews are Unitarians, and so are the Unitarians that are not Hebrews.

Mr. UPSHAW. I would remind my honored friend that it is not the province of this Government to be a patron of any particular form of religion, but recognizing the place of religion in establishing morale in the citizen and the soldier, it is the duty of the Government to encourage any religion that inspires reverence for God and makes for morality.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, I am of that view. I am not antagonizing that view.

Mr. UPSHAW. And for that reason I wish to emphasize this fact: If it is the duty of this Government to pay our honored Chaplain to pray in this House every morning for the good influence it has—and he is a Christian minister, because the Christian religion is the dominant faith of the Members of this House; if it is the duty of this Government to provide a chaplain of the religious faith that is dominant in our Army, whether Protestant or Catholic, I do not think the Government can afford to maintain an attitude toward the Hebrew that can mean but one of two things—either religious neglect or religious coercion. I had prepared an amendment to offer directing the Secretary of War to appoint five Hebrew chaplains at large, but if he has the right already to do this thing, then I would like to go on record as favoring an appointment in the Regular Establishment of enough Hebrew chaplains to minister to our Jewish soldiers. Manifestly there are so few of them it would not be practicable to have one for each unit.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UPSHAW. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. During the war they did have Hebrew chaplains. I had the pleasure of meeting one overseas myself.

Mr. UPSHAW. Yes; but they were emergency war-time appointments. I am speaking of chaplains that shall be permanent, and so located geographically that they can minister to the Hebrew soldier, who otherwise would be neglected. I am thinking now of an honest Polish Hebrew, bending beneath his peddler's pack, who used to visit my father's home, bowing always with the family around the family altar at the hour of evening worship. Kindness won his heart, and he came at last to acknowledge Christ as his own Redeemer; and I say this as my last word, that personally, as a Christian man myself, I would that every honest Hebrew would see in the Hebrew Christ the Messiah who has already come and who has meant so much to me in my own heart and life, but until he does, as long as the Hebrew soldier wishes his own rabbi as his teacher, then, in the name of the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, the God of Jacob, and the God of American freedom, I say let the voice of the Hebrew soul be heard. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, we also agreed to go back to the item relating to chemical warfare, on page 20, section 11. I understand that the gentleman from Alabama desires to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 11 has been read.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, line 24, after the words and figures "Sec. 12a," strike out all of the balance of lines 24 and 25, on page 20, and all of lines 1, 2, 3, and 4, on page 21, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 12a. Chemical Warfare Service: The Chemical Warfare Service is hereby created as a bureau of the War Department, and like other bureaus of such department, shall be under the immediate supervision and control of the Secretary of War, and shall not form part of any bureau, office, or other organization; and shall consist of 1 brigadier general, who shall be chief of Chemical Warfare Service; 5 colonels; 6 lieutenant colonels; 18 majors; 37 captains; 35 first lieutenants; 22 second lieutenants; 1 band leader; 12 master chemical engineers (senior grade); 20 master chemical engineers (junior grade); 1 regimental sergeant major; 1 regimental supply sergeant; 3 battalion sergeant majors; 3 battalion supply sergeants; 13 first sergeants; 38 sergeants (first class); 1 sergeant bugler; 2 color sergeants; 1 assistant band leader; 4 band sergeants; 4 musicians (first class); 76 sergeants; 10 stable sergeants; 13 supply sergeants; 13 mess sergeants; 8 horseshoers; 6 band corporals; 6 musicians (second class); 156 corporals; 2 corporal buglers; 12 musicians (third class); 10 saddlers; 30 mechanics; 13 buglers (first class); 34 wagoners; 34 cooks; 337 privates (first class); 13 buglers; and 674 privates. The duties of the Chemical Warfare Service shall comprise the investigation, development, manufacture, or procurement and supply to the Army of all smoke and incendiary materials, all toxic gases, and all gas-defense appliances; the research, design, and experimentation connected with chemical warfare and its matériel; and chemical projectile filling plants and proving grounds; the supervision of the training of the Army in chemical warfare, both offensive and defensive, including the necessary schools of instruction; and the organization, equipment, training, and operation of special gas troops."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I have a preferential amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers a preferential amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 21, line 4, after the word "men," insert: "The duties of the Chemical Warfare Service shall comprise the investigation, development, manufacture, or procurement and supply to the Army of all smoke and incendiary materials, all toxic gases, and all gas-defense appliances; the research, design, and experimentation connected with the chemical warfare and its matériel; and chemical projectile filling plants and proving grounds; supervision of the training of the Army in chemical warfare, both offensive and defensive, including the necessary schools of instruction; reorganization, equipment, training, and operation of special gas troops."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment that I have offered is the latter part of the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]. It fixes the duties of the Chemical Warfare Service without reference to the personnel.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I stated the other day when we reached this section of the bill that the Chemical Warfare Service was recognized as a new service in the Army, but that there was no provision in the bill prescribing its duties, and that the bill itself really did not fix the number of organizations within that service. By unanimous consent of the Committee of the Whole this section was passed for the purpose of allowing me to offer an amendment perfecting it. I have offered the amendment, and the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] accepts that portion of the amendment describing the duties, powers, and functions of the Chemical Warfare Service. I stated the other day that if we recognized the existence of the Chemical Warfare Service without prescribing its functions or fixing the organization, in view of the testimony of the Chief of Staff before the Committee on Military Affairs that the Chemical Warfare Service may never accomplish what Congress intended, I think Congress should certainly fix the personnel of the organization of this service as well as prescribe its duties if this service is to be continued.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. I notice that the amendment provides for a band. What need has the Chemical Warfare Service for a band?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, many organizations of this kind have a band organization if they have a regiment. It would take me a long time to explain to the gentleman exactly the necessity of the details of the organization. The object of this organization is to provide a regiment, a complete regiment, for the purpose of carrying the chemical warfare development into actual operation and effect. Chemical warfare service involves offensive and defensive warfare. The Chemical Warfare Service involves scientific chemical research. The Chemical Warfare Service involves the training of men in the use of gas masks and in the use of gas, both offensively and defensively, so that it ought to have an organization not only that will develop and engage in research, but it ought to have an organization that will train the Army how to use gas both offensively and defensively. Under my amendment there is a provision for the organization of a complete regiment in accordance with the general plan of organization in the Army.

I confess that I became acquainted largely with the details of the great work that this service has performed from my friend Gen. William L. Sibert [applause], who organized the service and who has recently been removed from it. I have no personal interest in the service, but am strongly convinced of its value. Why Gen. Sibert was removed I do not know, but I trust the committee will be patient in allowing me to submit the record that Gen. Sibert has made in the Army of the United States.

A native Alabamian, William L. Sibert graduated from West Point with high distinction. He was assigned to the Corps of Engineers. He performed valuable river and harbor work upon the Ohio River in particular. Without any political pull, when the Panama Canal was to be constructed, President Roosevelt selected him as one of the commissioners to build the canal. He was assigned to the specific duty of constructing the Gatun Dam and Locks. He dammed the Chagres River when the late Senator Morgan, of Alabama, who for years had advocated some form of transcontinental canal, said that that river could not be dammed. After his service there the Congress of the United States, along with the other members of that commission, extended to him its thanks, authorized a promotion above the grade that he occupied, and further authorized his voluntary retirement before reaching the age of 64. This he has continuously refused to accept. After his work with the Panama Canal he was assigned to the Pacific coast in charge of the Coast Artillery as a line officer. He succeeded well and ably in that work. When the war broke out he was assigned to the organization and training of the first division that went to France.

He organized it, trained it, and carried it to France. He commanded that division in France and was for a time placed second in command to Gen. Pershing. For some reason he was returned to this country and placed temporarily in command of the Southeastern Department at Charleston, and then when the Chemical Warfare Service was established the Secretary of War very properly called Gen. Sibert to take charge of the organization and development of that branch of the service. Gen. Sibert took charge of it, developed it during the war, and has made out of it, in my humble judgment, one of the greatest developments that the war established. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I want to ask the gentleman if Gen. Sibert was not being pursued at the time he was sent back from France, just as he is now being pursued when removed from the Chemical Warfare Service?

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman I hope not. I will state to the gentleman that while Gen. Sibert has been made a full major general of the line and could to-day under act of Congress retire as a major general he feels that he is so active that he should accept any order issued by the War Department and has agreed to take charge of a camp at Camp Gordon, Ga.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. KAHN. To try to close debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I move that all debate on this section be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has been recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Well, in 10 minutes.

Mr. DENT. I hope the gentleman will wait until I have finished.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has been recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I trust——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman for a suggestion or a question.

Mr. MONDELL. I trust debate will continue on lines within the rule. It is very interesting to review and hear reviewed the history of these distinguished gentlemen, but we have been on this bill a long time and it seems to me we should close the debate pretty soon, unless gentlemen desire to discuss the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I had practically finished all that I desired to say. What I have said with reference to Gen. Sibert was not intended as any criticism of anybody, but I think his record will justify that statement and I believe that those who know him on either side of this House will not object to the matter appearing in the RECORD.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield for just a second? Was not Gen. Sibert one of the first men who testified in the Senate committee against the half a million men Army for the next fiscal year?

Mr. DENT. He was the very first.

Mr. SANFORD. And he told the truth about it?

Mr. DENT. I think he is one of the ablest men in the Army, and I think he knows as much, if not more, about military legislation than any man in the Army. I think he is perfectly fearless in stating his views.

Mr. SANFORD. Did not the trouble start after his statement made over there?

Mr. DENT. I can not answer that question. That is a conclusion the gentleman might draw himself.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Under the gentleman's amendment, if agreed to, Gen. Sibert can not be then placed in command again of the Chemical Warfare Service?

Mr. DENT. No; I do not think Gen. Sibert expects to; he has accepted the situation that has been presented to him.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I think it is a great misfortune he can not be put back.

Mr. DENT. Personally I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi, and I think that the Chief of the Chemical Warfare Service, one of the greatest developments of the war, ought to be a major general, and I would vote for it personally myself.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. But if the amendment makes it a major general it excludes Gen. Sibert?

Mr. DENT. If the gentleman from Mississippi will read my amendment, he will see I amended my amendment in order to meet the views of the Committee on Military Affairs, which made the chief a brigadier general. I really think he ought to be a major general. Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I know that this provision of my amendment relative to the personnel is contrary to the theory upon which this bill has been written, because the theory upon which this bill has been written has been to fix the total number of officers in each branch of the service from the grades of colonel down to whatever lower rank they are and leave to the War Department the fixing of the number in the different grades. This is a new service, a development of the war, and if it has any unfriendly administration we all know that unless the personnel is fixed as a new service that the service itself is liable to prove a failure. It is for that reason I have provided the personnel of this service. I admit, of course, that I have gotten the strength of the different branches of the service, the total number of enlisted men, from men who are interested in this service. The only difference between the number of officers in my amendment and in the bill as proposed is that my amendment provides for 124 officers and the committee bill provides for something less than 100—93 I believe it is. The number of men is 1,500 in the committee bill, and mine is 1,571.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. CONNALLY. I would like to ask this question. Now, expert chemists and others will be required. How are you going to get those? Are you going to put commissioned officers in or civilians from the outside, or how are you going to get these expert chemists? You will have to have a lot of these expert chemists, will you not?

Mr. DENT. You do have to have a lot of expert chemists, and unless they get men from the outside I do not see how they will get them.

Mr. CONNALLY. How can they do it under this bill when it requires they shall have served during the war in order to be entitled to a commission?

Mr. DENT. I do not think you could do it under this bill, and for that reason I think this bill ought to be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, which motion I propose to make, because it has so many defects in it. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is all I have to say. [Applause.]

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HULINGS. To strike out the last word.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman change that to six minutes. I want just one minute of time.

Mr. KAHN. All right. Make it six minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in six minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I find myself somewhat embarrassed in connection with this bill, because I know how earnestly the gentlemen of the Committee on Military Affairs have labored on it. And yet, sir, I can not help but think that they have made mistakes in more directions than one. I believe that they have made this standing Army a great deal larger than there is any use for in this country or liable to be any use for in this country for some time to come. Instead of 299,000 enlisted men we ought to have not to exceed 150,000 men. The bill provides for 17,820 commissioned officers, very many of them in the high ranks. The bill is top-heavy with major generals and brigadier generals. I think you are loading up a military expense bill for this country far greater than there is any necessity for. [Applause.] I believe this bill from its foundation has been built up around one central figure, and that is the Chief of Staff. I do not see any reason why the Chief of Staff should appoint all the officers in the Army. I do see why he should be enabled at will to appoint in active service, on full pay, retired officers or reserve officers. By the terms of this bill, of course, the Chief of Staff is under the Secretary of War, but you know where the Secretary of War has been with the present Chief of Staff. I believe the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] that the bill should be referred to the committee in order that it make changes that have been indicated by the temper of the House.

For instance, you put in a construction corps and you have thrown out the transport service. This ought to be exactly the reverse. There have been so many Members on this floor to whom I have spoken about this bill, whose approval the bill does not meet, that I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama, that the bill should go back to the committee and be returned here again with some of these conditions modified or taken out of the bill, should be followed.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULINGS. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman knows that in all stages of the country's history the military laws established a much larger army than Congress provided for by appropriations. So this is no exception to the rule under the law as it prevails.

Mr. HULINGS. It may be of the 299,000 men authorized you would get only 200,000, but I see the bill provides they can go on and expend all the money required up to the limitation of the appropriation for these people, by appointing other reserve or retired officers. So that if the enlisted force does not come up to the 299,000 men, and money is saved out of the appropriation, the Chief of Staff can appoint as many reserve or retired officers on full pay as he chooses, which will use up any savings, and so your appropriation will be used up, even if you do not have 299,000 enlisted men.

You have not treated the National Guard properly. There is very grave doubt as to the constitutionality of the action in respect to them. The National Guard is a part of the militia, and the President of the United States has authority as Commander in Chief over the militia when called into service, but until that time he has no authority under the Constitution over the militia. I know Congress, under another clause of the Constitution, has the right to raise an army, but can not raise it out of anything except the militia.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman says we have not given the National Guard enough. What more would the gentleman give the Guard than this bill does?

Mr. HULINGS. The bill does not preserve the right of the State to appoint the officers and train the troops.

Mr. ANTHONY. We have given the guard practically all of that.

Mr. HULINGS. No; by your bill the National Guard now is swallowed up by the Regular Army. For 25 years the Regulars have tried to destroy the National Guard. It would not be killed, and now they propose to swallow it in this bill. Every shred of the authority of the State to appoint the officers or train the militia is taken away in this bill and the whole business vested in a military autocracy stationed here at Washington.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I favor the proposition of the gentleman from California so far as the Chemical Warfare Service is concerned, but I want to say that I can not vote for this bill, for several reasons. One is that we have failed to take advantage of the lessons we have learned in the war; and, second, we have again put off the question of preparing the country; and, third, the bill we have now prepared in this committee is clearly unconstitutional in one respect at least. And I do not feel that, under my oath as a Member of Congress, after having read the Constitution and the decisions of the Supreme Court, which clearly hold that the National Guard section just adopted is unconstitutional, I can not in conscience vote for the bill, and therefore I intend to vote against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from California—the perfecting amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] striking out the section and inserting the matter which has been read at the Clerk's desk.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the committee also agreed to go back to the first section of the bill.

Mr. CALDWELL. I suggest we pass that over and let the conferees take it up. On the division of the question before the House, on the vote to be taken on it, if it is knocked out of the bill it will not be in here. I therefore ask unanimous consent——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. You can arrange in the House by unanimous consent to vote on the two amendments together.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. KAHN: Page 2, line 6, after the word "Department," insert "construction corps."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, after having heard the varied views of the gentlemen on the minority side, I am almost persuaded that this bill is not absolutely perfect. Not that I expected that it would be, not that anyone else expected that it would be, not that any piece of legislation which this House has ever passed or ever will pass has been or will be perfect. But it would seem from what gentlemen on the other side say that this is really quite an imperfect piece of legislation.

I am reminded of the old Quaker who, as I recall it, talking with his wife, said, "I sometimes think, my dear, that all the world is queer, saving thee and me," and as I recall it on second thought he concluded that "thee might be just a little queer also at times."

That seems to be the attitude of the opposition on the minority side. There seem to be five official views in regard to this bill on the part of the minority, and as many more unofficial views as there are Members of the minority. There are some Members of the minority who agree with the majority. Then there were four Members of the minority that, more or less, and to a certain extent, and with certain reservations, agreed with each other; and then there was another gentleman of the minority that, after having read the minority report, with which he thought he agreed, concluded that he had to make some further reservations, which he did under his signature. And there was still another member of the minority who entirely disagreed with all the minority and all the majority. The bill was not large enough; it did not provide for enough either of officers or men, and he must vote against it under his oath, owing to that fact, as he just recently announced to us.

Now, what is the situation? In matters of legislation we must be guided——

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I am sure the gentleman did not want to misrepresent my position. I take it that he was referring to my remarks.

Mr. MONDELL. I heard the gentleman say something about his oath, and I understood him to say that under his oath he could not support this bill.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman has not quoted me as I have stated my view in my report.

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to put the gentleman's report in my remarks if that will straighten the matter out so as to exactly suit him.

Mr. CALDWELL. Very well. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. MONDELL. In order that the gentleman may not be misunderstood, here or elsewhere, now or at some future time, here are his minority views:

VIEWS OF MR. CALDWELL.

There are many reasons why I can not support this bill, a full statement of which would take more space than usually occupied by a minority report. Suffice it to say, however, that the bill is not an Army reorganization bill in any sense, but can only be considered as a bill to amend the Hay bill, commonly referred to as the national-defense act, in the drafting of which in many instances I supported the proposition with the idea that they were to be followed by a provision incorporating universal military training for which a majority of the whole committee, at one time, voted and for which never less than half of the committee expressed their approval until this bill was completed.

The bill is not constructive but destructive, for under it it will be impossible to have as large or as efficient a force as can be secured under the Hay bill without amendment. While the bill in terms authorizes 299,000 enlisted strength by the change in term of enlistment and the repeal of the provisions authorizing an enlisted reserve, it makes it impossible for the Government to have under its control at any time more than 125,000 men and consequently be in a position where it would not have use for more than 5,000 or 6,000 officers, 10,000 at the outside, while the bill provides for 18,000 officers.

Under the bill as framed, the annual expense will be practically twice that incurred when the Hay bill was in operation and will produce about half the results.

The bill establishes a single list for promotions, which is a step in the right direction and has my approval. In that respect it should have been established many years ago, and though the arrangement specified in the bill does not get rid of all the inequalities caused by prior legislation, it is an advance.

Following the Civil War, under Republican control, the Army was reduced from over a million men to something like 25,000, and now following the World War, under Republican control, it is sought to reduce the Army from 4,200,000 to what will actually approximate 100,000 men, the average length of service of which, under the one-year enlistment plan, will be approximately six months, while one-half of the actual enlisted strength of the Army will have on the average three months' training in the event of war. With these modifications producing these results, the committee has very appropriately taken rank away from men chaplains and given it to female nurses.

Mr. Chairman, what was the situation when the committee took up the preparation of an Army reorganization bill? In a matter of this kind, while we all have our views and some imagine that we know about what a military organization should be, after all, as Members of Congress, we must, to a certain degree at least, listen to the experts and pay some attention to what the department and the administration has to say.

What did the administration propose? What was the official pronouncement, which ought to have some little binding effect on the gentlemen of the administration party? What was the official pronouncement relative to an army? The Secretary of War proposed an army of 576,000 officers and men, an army of just about twice the size of the maximum army provided in this bill, and in support of that recommendation, made with the expectation on the part of the administration, I assume, that the League of Nations was going to be approved, came a corresponding estimate lacking just a few pennies of $1,000,000,000 as the sum estimated by the administration as the amount essential for the support of the military organization the coming year.

In addition to that, the administration proposed, suggested, and advised a system of universal compulsory military training, and that, of course, whatever its cost might have been, would have been above and in excess of the $1,000,000,000 that was estimated as the cost of the regular establishment proposed. Now, that was the official pronouncement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that I may have five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. That was the official program before the committee when it took up the necessary and essential work of reorganizing the Army. The committee has brought in a bill providing for an army which at its maximum will be about half the size of the army asked for by the administration, a bill which makes no provision for universal compulsory military training or service—and it was service training that was proposed by the Secretary of War.

The administration bill provided for an army of approximately 30,000 officers, and the bill before us provides for a little less than 18,000 officers. The administration's proposal, which would have cost $1,000,000,000 without the universal training, is matched by a bill under which an appropriation of approximately $400,000,000, possibly less, will make adequate provision for the peace-time strength of the organization proposed. So the committee reduced the Army by half compared to that proposed by the administration.

I have no doubt the committee will bring in an appropriation bill carrying considerably less than half of the departmental estimate for the support of the Army. Yet some gentlemen on the other side say it is too large. Well, I am willing to agree with gentlemen on either side, that in my opinion we do not need just at this time all of the officers or all of the men provided for in this organization. I do not think anyone anticipates or expects that we will have in the immediate future or in normal peace times all of the officers or all of the men provided as the maximum of this organization. But we have gone through a great war. New methods of warfare have been developed in that war. We have the Chemical Warfare Service, a branch of the Army not even dreamed of at the beginning of that war, and now for the first time provided for. We have the Air Service, a service insignificant at the outbreak of the war, but now one of the most important and one of the most expensive branches of the Army. The lessons of the war relative to transport make it necessary and essential that we have a larger transport corps, a larger number of men and officers devoted to transport than heretofore. One of the lessons of the war was in the use of artillery, and so we are providing for a larger use of artillery, requiring a much larger personnel in that branch than heretofore, compared with the number of rifles. The rifle or rather the line strength of the Army is increased in this bill, as I understand, only 45,000 men, but these new services and increases in old branches of the service, mostly staff corps, the importance of which have been accentuated by recent experiences, bring the total to something like 80,000 men above the maximum of the present establishment. No one ever accused me of being in favor of an unnecessarily large Military Establishment, but my opinion is that it would be very difficult indeed to frame an Army bill so as to provide for all the essential branches and reduce the maximum very much below that provided for in this bill, although I think that maximum will not be filled in normal peace times.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MONDELL. May I have one minute?

Mr. KAHN. I ask that the gentleman have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Wyoming be extended one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming whether he has taken steps to give us a record vote on what is known as the Sanford amendment, which gives an entirely new and unnecessary corps?

Mr. MONDELL. The chairman of the committee will take care of that.

Mr. KAHN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if he does not know that under the national defense act as it exists it is capable of raising an Army of 220,000 men, so that the increase in this bill is not much above that.

Mr. MONDELL. That was my impression, that there was a total possible increase of officers and men of something like, perhaps, 80,000. I do not pretend the bill is perfect, but it does represent the judgment of a considerable majority of a committee which has given much time and earnest study to the subject. We shall not appropriate for the maximum strength provided for, but it did seem necessary to provide for approximately the organization which is contemplated by this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. There is an additional committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 4, line 13, after the word "department," where used the first time, insert the words "construction corps."

Mr. BLANTON. I desire to be heard on the amendment.

Mr. KAHN. I move that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the fact that I agreed with the gentleman from Wyoming when, after the passage of the Sanford amendment creating a new construction corps, he appeared on the floor suddenly and very appropriately told us that a wrong action had been taken. I sincerely hope that in the past few days which have elapsed since the passage of that amendment, when this new and unnecessary separate and distinct corps, which the Secretary of War has said is unnecessary, was created by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and which entails an enormous unnecessary expense to the Government, I hope that the distinguished leader of the majority, the gentleman from Wyoming, has been able to gather sufficient strength, so that upon a roll call, a record vote, he will be able to defeat the amendment when we get into the House. If he does not do it—I hate to make the assertion—if he does not do it, I am afraid that somebody has been asleep on the job during all this time. He said that it should not have been passed. He is the leader of the majority; he is all powerful here; he is supposed to speak what his side of the House, at least, ought to do, and I think when we get authority of that kind on the floor of the House, telling us what should have been done, he ought to be able to change it in the House, as I can assure him he will get a few votes from this side. I want him to tell us what excuse he is going to give the country in case the Sanford amendment carries when we get back into the House, because I am going to see to it that a record vote is had on the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. WALSH) having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the previous question is ordered. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a separate vote on the Sanford amendment creating a separate construction corps and all amendments pertaining thereto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks for a separate vote on the amendment creating a separate construction corps and all amendments thereto.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is the amendment of Mr. SANFORD for a separate construction corps and the two amendments which have been agreed to, offered by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SANFORD. There were two amendments which I offered pertaining to the construction corps, which makes four amendments altogether.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Two amendments on page 16, one on page 4, and one on page 2.

Mr. SANFORD. Yes; one on page 16 and another on pages 16 and 17, and the two adopted, one on page 4 and one on page 2, making four in all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the vote may be taken together on the four amendments relating to the construction corps, whenever it is taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the vote on the amendments relating to the construction corps may be taken en bloc. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the other amendments.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the amendments relating to the construction corps, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SANFORD: Page 16, after line 13, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"SEC. 8a. Construction service: The construction service shall consist of one chief of construction with the rank of brigadier general, 250 officers of the grades from colonel to captain, inclusive, and 8,000 enlisted men. The chief of construction, under the authority of the Secretary of War, shall be charged with construction, maintenance, and repair of buildings, structures (other than fortifications), and utilities, and the preparation of plans therefor, in accordance with the requirements of the several arms, corps, bureaus, and services of the Army of the United States, and with the operation of utilities in connection therewith and with acquirement of real estate and issuance of licenses in connection with the military reservations under the jurisdiction of the War Department."

Page 16, line 20, strike out the words "one thousand and fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "eight hundred"; same page, line 22, strike out the word "twenty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twelve"; same page, line 19, strike out the word "three" and insert the word "two" in lieu thereof; also, on page 17, strike out the following, beginning with the word "with," on line 3, to and including the word "reservations," line 10.

Page 2, line 6, after the word "department," insert the words "construction corps." Page 4, line 13, after the word "department," insert the words "construction corps."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, on this vote I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 159, nays 170, answered "present" 2, not voting 95, as follows:

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DENT moves to recommit the bill H. R. 12775 to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions to report the same back with amendments providing for—

First. That the total enlisted force of the line of the Regular Army, excluding the Philippine Scouts and the enlisted men of the Quartermaster Corps and of the Medical Department and of the Signal Corps and the unassigned recruits, shall not at any time except in actual or threatened war exceed 185,000 men.

Second. That the commissioned personnel of the Regular Army shall not exceed 14,000 officers, divided in grades not to exceed the following percentages: Colonels, 2½ per cent; lieutenant colonels, 3 per cent; majors, 7½ per cent; captains, 30 per cent; first lieutenants, 29 per cent; second lieutenants, 28 per cent.

Third. That the War Department General Staff within the District of Columbia be limited to not exceeding 50 officers.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, on that I move——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois will state his point of order.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know I shall insist upon it if it is a good point of order. The motion to recommit directs the Committee on Military Affairs to report back immediately the bill in a way that is not indicated. If the motion should be put it would be a physical impossibility to comply with it. It does not set out the amendment at all that it is proposed to have reported back by the Committee on Military Affairs, but is merely a direction to that committee to prepare amendments to conform with the direction, and it would probably take I do not know how many amendments but a great many different amendments under the provisions of the bill and could not be complied with. After having stated that, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California moves the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has the Chair passed on the point of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois withdrew his point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. A very good thing he did.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is a good point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now comes on the motion offered by the gentleman from Alabama to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs with certain instructions.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama demands the yeas and nays. Evidently there is a sufficient number and the yeas and nays are ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 115, nays 222, answered "present" 1, not voting 88, as follows:

COMPENSATION OF LABORERS, CUSTOMS SERVICE.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House bill 11309 be taken from the Speaker's table, and the Senate amendment concurred in.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that House bill 11309, with a Senate amendment, be taken from the Speaker's table and the amendment concurred in. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11309) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to fix the compensation of certain laborers in the Customs Service.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

Mr. CALDWELL and Mr. RAMSEYER rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. CALDWELL. I rise to direct the attention of the leadership on that side of the House to the fact that it is late, and we have worked pretty hard on the passage of the Army reorganization bill, and I think we ought to adjourn now. I dislike to make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, for Friday and Saturday, on account of important business.

To Mr. BEE (at the request of Mr. GARNER), for to-day, on account of important business.

To Mr. MACGREGOR, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

H. J. Res. 299. Joint resolution extending the term of the National Screw Thread Commission for a period of two years from March 21, 1920.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. VAILE rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Colorado rise?

Mr. VAILE. I rise to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on two subjects, the soldiers' bonus pay and national highways.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subjects of soldiers' bonus pay and national highways. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

OFFICERS' PAY BILL.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to make an inquiry: When will they bring in a rule on the question of the officers' pay bill?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The committee has not acted on it.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13108, known as the naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13108, the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. BUTLER. And, pending that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the attention of my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] to see if we can arrange for the time of general debate.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to ask the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, whether we may expect this bill up for consideration in the House to-morrow?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir. I hope the Speaker will permit us to go into Committee of the Whole for that purpose to-morrow at 12 o'clock, or soon after that.

I will ask my colleague about how much time he thinks we will need for general debate? On this side they have asked for three hours. Shall we say that the general debate shall not exceed six hours, and that one-half of the time shall be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee and one-half by myself, and if the gentleman does not have use for all the time over there I am sure he will observe the same generous disposition he has always shown and give us five or six hours.

Mr. PADGETT. Say, six hours.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, after conferring with my colleague, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], I will ask that the general debate be limited to six hours, one-half of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] and one-half by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] asks unanimous consent that the general debate be limited to six hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennesseee [Mr. PADGETT] and one-half by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING]. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he is trying to get any kind of an order for the House to meet at 11 o'clock.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I very much wish that the House would consent to that. I have not yet talked to Mr. MONDELL about it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I am opposed to it.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well, then. I will make no effort to get that agreement. It would have to be done by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to the limitation and control of the time for general debate?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will take the chair. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN of Illinois took the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 13108) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. MANN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 13108) had come to no resolution thereon.

COOPERATIVE PERSONAL RURAL CREDIT.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, the bill (H. R. 12678) introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] to establish a cooperative rural credit system based on personal security is one of vital importance to the whole country. If that bill were enacted into law, it would place our farmers on the same footing respecting productive credit as the European farmers have enjoyed for years.

This bill proposes to create two corporations by special charters, a rural credit society and general insurance league. The broad scope of this measure forces me to limit my discussion to two articles of the rural credit charter, to article 2, defining the powers of the corporation, and article 7, providing for its control by responsible farmers for the production of agriculture. That charter is divided into articles, the articles being divided into sections, the sections into paragraphs, and the paragraphs being divided into subparagraphs. There is a headnote at the beginning of each article which indicates the general subject treated in the whole article, while the headnote of the sections, paragraphs, and subparagraphs indicates the special subject treated in each. Only one subject is treated in a paragraph, and when a subject is once introduced it is fully treated in an orderly sequence, and if the same subject is treated in another article reference is made to it. A reader of ordinary intelligence may obtain a fairly accurate understanding of the bill by merely reading those headnotes, as the text is only the legal phraseology of the headnote. It is impossible to conceal a joker in a bill so drawn.

POWERS OF THE RURAL CREDIT SOCIETY.

The meat of the rural credit charter is contained in articles 2 and 7. Article 2 grants to the corporation the broad power to do a general banking and credit business. There are but two limitations on its power to do such business. One of such limitations is a prohibition against its issuance of bank notes or currency, a privilege enjoyed exclusively by the Federal reserve banks, and the other prohibits its local associations or communes from receiving deposits. It is to be observed, therefore, that there is no limitation of the rural credit society's authority to pursue the ancient practice of "banking with bills."

THE THREE SYSTEMS OF BANKING.

To fully appreciate this provision of the charter I shall make a few observations on the ancient practice of banking with bills of exchange, or, as it is commonly termed, "banking with bills." Gilbart, the highest authority on banking and ablest banker that ever wrote on the theory of banking, says:

> Banking is a kind of trade carried on for the purpose of getting money. The trade of a banker differs from other trades, inasmuch as it is carried on chiefly with the money of other people.
> The trading capital of a bank may be divided into two parts—the invested capital and the banking capital. The invested capital is the money paid down by the partners for the purpose of carrying on the business. This may be called the real capital. The banking capital is that portion of the capital which is created by the bank itself in the course of its business, and may be called the borrowed capital.
> There are three ways of raising a banking or borrowed capital. First, by receiving deposits; secondly, by issuing of notes; thirdly, by the drawing of bills.

HISTORY OF ANCIENT SYSTEM OF "BANKING WITH BILLS."

The system of "banking with bills" is the oldest system of banking, antedating the other two systems in Europe by more than 18 centuries, of which we have authentic history. Gibbins, in his "History of Commerce in Europe," in referring to the Greek colonies, says, "Bills of exchange were freely used in the fourth century B. C." And in treating of the same subject at a later period the same author says:

Certainly, bills of exchange were current among the commercial States of Italy in the early part of the fourteenth century, and they were also known about the middle of the same century in England. The use of foreign bills is said to have preceded that of inland. At first used only as a means of remittance, they gradually came to serve many other purposes as their use became better understood and their utility recognized; so that, in time, they formed a paper currency of great utility.

Hazlitt, the historian of the Venetian Republic, contends that this system of "banking with bills" "long remained in universal vogue" before either of the other two banking systems made its advent into Europe. British commerce was financed exclusively with bills of exchange until the seventeenth century, when the king confiscated the merchants' gold in the Tower of London, where it was held for the liquidation of their bills of exchange. In the year 1613 the Court of King's Bench, in the case of Oaste against Taylor, Three hundred and sixth Modern King's Bench reports, held none but merchants or traders could either draw or accept a bill of exchange; and in 1702 the same court, in Buller against Crips, held a promissory note to be a nonnegotiable instrument, thus giving to the producers and distributors of commerce a monopoly in the creation of negotiable instruments. Sir Josiah Child, that eminent man of business and economist, in an excellent essay on trade published in London in 1678, charges the "new-fashioned" bankers, as the deposit and note-issue banks were then termed, with causing the interest rate in England to be 2 per cent higher than in Holland, due to their practice of paying 6 per cent on deposits.

France, even to this day, permits none but commercial men and farmers, actual producers and distributors of commerce, to accept or draw bills of exchange, or to "bank with bills"; and previous to the establishment of the Credit Agricole—the French personal rural credit system—the commercial men of France enjoyed a monopoly of this ancient banking practice, and it is admitted by all monetary writers that France has the soundest credit institutions, and their soundness is attributable largely to the fact that none but producers can "bank with bills."

SUPERIORITY OF "BILLS" OVER PROMISSORY NOTES.

The form of the bill of exchange differs little from the form of the promissory note, except that a bill of exchange carries upon its face abundant proof that it represents a real productive transaction. Credit used for production not only enriches the borrower but becomes a wealth-producing factor to the community and nation as well, while credit used for consumption not only impoverishes the borrower but is detrimental to the community and nation where practiced, and where consumptive or speculative credit is practiced on an extensive scale it will cause the whole banking or credit system to break down. The man who obtains productive credit has on pay day not only the principal but frequently the principal is multiplied manyfold. The farmer with only a spade can produce but little agriculture compared to what he could with a good team of horses and suitable plows; therefore it is to the interest of the Republic, and to every citizen of the Republic, to have its energetic, honest, and frugal men supplied with the tools necessary to make their efforts productive. The curse of America since colonial days has been consumptive credit; that is, buying something to eat or wear on credit. In Europe consumptive credit is well-nigh prohibited, while every encouragement is offered to productive credit. Section 1 of article 9 of the rural-credit charter properly safeguards the credit instruments of the proposed system by requiring the purpose of each credit to be stated in each instrument.

THE ECONOMY OF MANAGEMENT OF PROPOSED CREDIT SYSTEM.

The expense of management of every banking or credit system must be paid by the borrowers, and deposit banking is the most expensive of all banking or credit systems. The deposit bank is usually situated in the business center, where real estate is high. It is equipped with expensive furniture and fixtures, so as to make a display of wealth, and it is managed by high-salaried officers, tellers, bookkeepers, and clerks, all for the purpose of selling credit, not money. Now, all this expense, as I have said, must eventually be borne by the borrowers. Contrast that awfully expensive system with the inexpensive system proposed by the McFadden bill. Only seven farmers are required to organize a community association or commune. Those seven farmer members must meet yearly to elect officers. Those officers would meet once, let us say, every two weeks to pass on the application of members for loans. The officers would meet in the home of a member, schoolhouse, church, or back room of a store for an hour or two, and thereby eliminate all office rent, furniture, and fixtures. The only paid official of the commune is the scribe, and, as it would require but three to five hours of his time per month, his salary would be nominal. In Europe school-teachers and ministers frequently act as scribes free of charge in order to keep in touch with the people of their communities. But under the proposed system the scribe would doubtless be the daughter of an officer or member, or a clerk or bookkeeper in a store, if the meeting place of the officers be in a town. The scribe would conduct the correspondence for the commune and become the custodian of the blank bills of exchange, chattel mortgages, and applications for insurance policies. As I have remarked, the whole expense of managing the commune would be nominal. The total expense of managing the communes in the Province of Silesia, Germany, for the year 1909 was but $62.50, and that for the whole of Germany only $152 to the commune, compared to $44,700 for managing the average national bank in this country, according to the 1915 report of the Comptroller of the Currency; and the total turnover of the German rural credit societies exceeded 15,000,000,000 marks in 1909, or nearly $4,000,000,000.

THIS SYSTEM WOULD BROADEN MARKET FOR PRODUCTIVE FARM CREDIT.

The farmer, of all producers of wealth, needs the broadest market for the sale of his productive credit, because he gambles on the seasons, the sunshine, rain, and frosts; yes, on the very seeds he sows; and yet our farmers have the narrowest credit market of all producers. The credit requirements of our commercial men are so large that it is an invitation to private capital to organize such credit agencies as Dun and Bradstreet, but the credit requirements of the average farmer are so small that it is out of the question to enlist private capital in such a credit agency, and without such an agency that would give our farmers national credit, they will continue to be dependent on the local credit institutions. This is not the case on the Continent of Europe. To illustrate the benefits of such an organization, I shall cite but one instance. In 1906 the frost killed the grape crop in the Rheims section of France, the Champagne grape section. So those vineyardists applied to their respective communes of the Credit Agricole—the French personal credit system—and drew bills of exchange for 11,000,000 ($2,200,000) francs, which were negotiated at the rate of 3½ per cent interest. By reason of such credit facilities those vineyardists limited their loss to the one crop, but without such credit facilities their loss might have been incalculable. Had they been dependent on the local banks and credit institutions, as is the case with the farmers in the United States, they could not have taken the proper care of those vines as they did. But by distributing that credit paper throughout the Republic of France it was absorbed by investors without working an inconvenience anywhere, and while it directly preserved an important industry which was centuries in developing, it indirectly prevented the failure of the local banks and credit institutions of the immediate section visited by such disaster. That was not Government credit. The Government had nothing to do with it, except provide the credit machinery, including $35,000,000 of capital for the central bank furnished by the Government, through which that business was done. Contrast that policy of enlightened statesmanship with the "root-hog-or-die" policy, or lack of policy, in this country when a similar disaster occurs in some community. Under such a condition our farmers flock to Congress begging for alms when we should create the machinery through which they could finance themselves.

HOW THE PROPOSED SYSTEM WOULD WORK.

In order to show the actual operation of the proposed system, let us suppose that a farmer member of a community association or commune at Hope, Ark., should desire $240 with which to buy a dairy cow. That is a credit which would reproduce or liquidate itself in monthly installments in from 1 to 24 months. So that farmer would apply to his commune at Hope, and if his application were approved by the officers, that farmer would draw 24 $10 bills of exchange on the commune, payable $10 monthly for 24 months. The officers of the Hope commune, if they accepted those 24 bills, would take a chattel mortgage on that cow and exact such other security as they deemed necessary for the protection of the commune.

Those 24 bills, together with the chattel mortgage and other security and insurance policies, would be forwarded to the Arkansas branch of the rural credit society, located, let us say, in Little Rock. The manager of the Little Rock branch would draw a check on some one of its depositaries, a State or national bank, in which it kept a balance, payable to the seller of that cow, and forward it back to the Hope commune, to be delivered to the seller of the cow.

If the Little Rock manager of the rural credit society did not have sufficient funds in its depositary banks to meet that $240 check, he would wire the central bank of the rural credit society, in Chicago or wherever located, and obtain authority to draw a short-time draft on the central bank, which draft would be discounted by the manager in one of the Arkansas depositary banks to create a credit with which to meet that $240 check. Those 24 bills would then be indorsed by the Little Rock branch of the rural credit society and forwarded to the central bank at Chicago to be indorsed by it and placed on the open market to be sold to the insurance companies, savings banks, private investors, and wage earners of our industrial centers. The life insurance companies should carry that class of liquid paper to meet their banking obligations, and the fire insurance companies should carry it to meet their conflagration losses. The late James J. Hill testified before the "Money Trust" investigating committee of the Sixty-second Congress that one of the causes of the 1907 panic was the fact that the fire insurance companies had to throw $360,000,000 of their permanent investments on the market to realize the cash with which to meet their conflagration losses in the San Francisco fire of 1906. Congress may legislate till doomsday on banks, but unless we create a class of liquid paper to meet the banking obligations of our life insurance companies and conflagration losses of our fire insurance companies we will continue to be cursed with periodical panics.

The central bank of the rural credit society would keep in touch with the money market, and therefore would be in a position to say to the branches what length of time their short-time drafts should be made for. If the central bank had applications on file for such paper, then the short-time drafts would be for only a very few days. It will be necessary, therefore, for the branches to be located in the financial centers of the several States which have ample banking facilities.

The branches would not have to wire in each individual case for such authority to draw on it, for in all probability the communes of each State would meet on the same day—say, every other Saturday. So that by the following Monday the Little Rock branch would be in receipt of all applications throughout Arkansas, and after ascertaining the total credit requirements of Arkansas for that day the manager of the Little Rock branch would wire the central bank in Chicago his exact credit status and obtain authority to make such short-time drafts on the central bank as would meet all the credit requirements of Arkansas at that time. The seller of that cow would have to wait three or four days to get his $240 check.

CONTROL OF THE RURAL CREDIT SOCIETY BY RESPONSIBLE FARMERS.

I now come to my second proposition, the control of the rural credit society by responsible farmers, as provided in article 7. That article is divided into three sections. One section treats of the national officers and legislators, the next of the State, and the last treats of the local officers and legislators of the rural credit society. It will be observed that section 2 appears twice in article 7, an error which is quite apparent. The first section 2 should be paragraph 12 of section 1, and paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 of the first section 2 should be paragraphs 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, and 18, respectively, of section 1, as all the last-named paragraphs treat of the national officers and legislators, while the second section 2 treats of the State officers and legislators, and section 3 treats of the local officers and legislators. I have called Mr. McFADDEN's attention to this error, and he agrees with me and says he will amend the bill to conform to what I have just said. Therefore, in my discussion of the bill I shall refer to the charter just as if this correction were made; that is, I shall refer to section 1 of article 7 as having 18 instead of 11 paragraphs.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH CREDIT SYSTEMS CONTRASTED WITH THOSE OF GERMANY.

In order to fully appreciate this rural credit charter one must contrast the credit systems of France and England with those of Germany. The credit institutions of France and England are the soundest in the world, because they are free from Government fetters, while Germany has the weakest credit system, because it is cursed with paternalism. "Ferboten" (forbidden) is the keynote of German credit legislation, while "freedom" is the keynote in France and England. Dr. André Liesse, the eminent French scholar and monetary writer, in "A Century's Evolution of French Credit, 1800–1900," contends the soundness of such institutions is attributable to the acts of 1863 and 1867 of the French Parliament creating "bank parliaments" for their banking and credit institutions. That principle was first adopted by the great Napoleon in 1800, when he applied it to the control of the Bank of France, and it was nearly three-quarters of a century before the French Parliament applied it to all French banks. In this connection I beg to read an excerpt from the statement of the governor of the Bank of France to the Monetary Commission we sent abroad in 1909. I give the question and answer:

Question. Is the Bank of France ever attacked in the controversies between political parties?

Answer. No charge has ever been made that the bank favored or aided any political party. There is never any claim that politics enters in any degree into the management of the bank. Except for the renewal of the charter in 1897, no legislation affecting the bank has been enacted since 1857. There is no sentiment for any change in banking methods nor for any new legislation. It should be added that neither the governor nor deputy governor (of the bank) is permitted to be a member of either body of parliament.

It is a revelation to the average American to learn that so important a corporation should operate for 40 years without legislative interference by the parliamentary body which created it. And what an eventful period those 40 years were! During that time France had a war with Germany in which she lost two of her fairest Provinces—Alsace-Lorraine—and paid a billion dollars indemnity; and, added to this, France experienced a revolution during that period in which she changed the form of her government from a monarchy to a republic. As legislators for an enlightened people, Congress should profit by the legislative experience of France and England on credit institutions. The "bank parliament" of the Bank of France is composed of 15 regents, or, as we would call them, directors, who are elected by the bank's 200 largest stockholders, who are great merchants. Therefore those 200 electors are selfishly interested in having that great bank serve commerce, the prime object of its creation. They also elect three censors to inspect the officers and directors of the bank and see to it that they do no wrong. By that system of self-inspection they save the French Government the expense and annoyance of Government inspection.

And in this connection let me say that the same principle of self-government and self-inspection is applied to the personal rural credit systems of Europe. Let me quote from the able address of Wollemborg, the founder of the Italian personal rural credit system and the greatest living authority on that subject, to the commission we sent abroad in 1913 to study rural credit. He said:

But when the loans are strictly limited to people residing in the same locality all become vigilant and act as inspectors for their own protection. And you will find that inspection thus exercised by the members themselves is far superior to any Government inspection, since each man has rendered himself personally liable and is acting as inspector in his own behalf. As one of the farmers once said to me, "We are 100, all acting as spies on the others to see that nobody does anything wrong."

Another remarkable statement made in this address by that rural credit expert was that during the 32 years the system had been in operation in Italy only 2 per cent of the loans were unpaid at maturity. He claimed that the first principle of rural credit as practiced in Europe was the use of credit for production only, for the purchase of fertilizers, live stock—for work and breeding purposes—farm machinery, cooperative creameries and canneries, drain tile, silos, and such things as became a direct means of production, just as this proposed system provides. Those societies would not sell a penny of credit with which to buy something to eat or wear or to have pleasure with. That is denominated consumptive credit, and where that is prohibited the people will take butter, eggs, or cordwood to town to sell for those consumptive articles, and such people will not overconsume when they have to pay the cash for them.

ANALYSIS OF THE CONTROL OF THE PROPOSED RURAL CREDIT SOCIETY.

Let me now analyze the control of the proposed rural credit society; and, in considering the control of every corporation, we must go to the very source of control, to the voting unit which elects the corporation's legislative body, its directors. The charter provides for three legislative bodies for the corporation—National, State, and local. The National is denominated the board of directors (sec. 1 of art. 7), the State is called the advisory council (par. 3 of sec. 2 of art. 7), and the local is named the supervisors (par. 3 of sec. 3 of art. 7). The members of the board of directors shall reside in the several States, one for each State; and, to avoid the expense for too frequent meetings of so numerous and scattered a body, the charter creates an executive committee. (Par. 17 of sec. 1 of art. 7.) This feature of the executive committee corresponds with the practice of the Bank of England, another great public-service corporation. The charter of that institution vests the legislative authority in a "court of proprietors," a body of several hundred great English merchants, who under the charter are authorized to meet annually to elect a board of 24 directors, a governor and deputy governor, and to legislate for the bank; and they are also authorized by the charter to meet semiannually for the purpose of legislating for the bank. But the "court of proprietors" were found to be too numerous a body to legislate for the bank, so they delegated their authority to the board of directors, and they in turn delegated their authority to a still smaller body, called the "bank court," which meets weekly, and during crises daily. But the charter vests that authority in the "court of proprietors," who may revoke it any time the two subordinate bodies fail to properly legislate for the bank, just as the board of directors may revoke the authority they delegate to the executive committee of the rural credit society. This decentralizes the control of the rural credit society by placing the supreme power in the several States of the Union, while their agents will be at the home office.

RESPONSIBLE FARMERS' CONTROL.

Let us now examine the responsibility of this control for the rural credit society. It will be observed that the directors, executive committeemen, and advisory councilmen must be members of communes of the first or second class—that is, communes whose members are unlimitedly liable for the payment of the obligations of their respective communes. The farmer who can not go out and find six farmer neighbors whom he is willing to trust, and who are willing to trust him, should not ask the privilege of legislating by enacting by-laws for farmers throughout the country who are willing to trust their neighbors. The communes of the first and second classes are nothing but partnerships, and the twentieth-century corporation is but the evolution of the first-century civil-law partnership. And the only justification for the twentieth-century corporation limiting the liability of its stockholders to their stock subscriptions is to raise capital from strangers—strangers to those who control the corporation. But we do not want strangers in those communes. Only farmers who are close neighbors, so that each may see that the others do nothing wrong, should form a commune.

No farmer can impose himself on the membership of a commune, for it is only by unanimous consent of all that a commune may be formed. The charter grants to the communes the right to enact by-laws, rules, and regulations for their self-protection the same as the farmer members of the European rural-credit societies legislate for themselves, and the same as the great merchants of England and France, who are legislators or directors of the Bank of England and Bank of France, legislate for those institutions.

It would never do for Congress to legislate on a personal productive rural-credit system as we did on the Federal Reserve System. In legislating for the latter we imposed so many restrictions on those in control that it was impossible for them to operate. Therefore the original act had to be amended before the system could be put in operation. And numerous other amendments to that act have been made from time to time by Congress, so that the amendments exceed the original act, and there are numerous other amendments now pending in Congress. That method of legislating for a farmers' credit institution would never do, as it would place them in politics, and force them to employ agents to remain here in Washington to secure amendments to the law. The bankers who have some $3,000,000,000 invested in that business have their paid agents here and they would be fighting any amendment to the rural-credit act. I therefore unreservedly commend that principle of the McFadden bill which gives full authority to the rural-credit society to "bank with bills" for the production of agriculture, and then creates legislative bodies through which those responsible farmers may carry on that business free from interference by Congress. Those farmers will make mistakes, to be sure, just like Congress has done time and again, but the experience in Europe, where this system of self-legislation has been thoroughly tried for more than a century, demonstrates that it is far safer and freer from mistakes than the attempt in this country to legislate the life out of every corporation we create. We have Germanized our credit institutions to the limit by hampering them with legislative restrictions, and it is time we consider the principles which prevail in Britain and France, whose credit institutions are far superior to those in Germany and this country.

CONCLUSION.

The Federal reserve act and the Federal farm loan law do not supply the want provided by the McFadden bill, because the former takes care of the commercial-credit needs, and the latter is to enable a man to buy a home, whereas the McFadden bill would enable the owner of that home to make it a profitable investment, and would open the door of opportunity to a vast number of men to capitalize their energy, honesty, and frugality for the production of agriculture. That is what Europe has done for their farmers, and we must follow the enlightened statesmanship of those countries that have banking and credit systems of proven success.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be received as in secret executive session and placed upon the calendar.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany as in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate in open executive session resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to move the amendment which I proposed to the resolving clause, which is printed on pages 1 and 2, to change the provisions requiring the other signatories to agree to the reservations of the United States prior to the filing of ratification by the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations is as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, subject to the following reservations and understandings, which are hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted by an exchange of notes as a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by at least three of the four principal allied and associated powers, to wit, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan.

To which the Senator from Massachusetts offers the following amendment:

After the word "accepted," on line 9, strike out the following words: "by an exchange of notes as a part and condition of this resolution of ratification by at least three of the four principal allied and associated powers, to wit, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan," and in lieu of those words insert, after the word "accepted," the following:

"As a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by the allied and associated powers, and a failure on the part of the allied and associated powers to make objection to said reservations and understandings prior to the deposit of ratification by the United States shall be taken as a full and final acceptance of such reservations and understandings by said powers."

So that if amended the resolution will read:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, subject to the following reservations and understandings, which are hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted as a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by the allied and associated powers, and a failure on the part of the allied and associated powers to make objection to said reservations and understandings prior to the deposit of ratification by the United States shall be taken as a full and final acceptance of such reservations and understandings by said powers.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I can state very briefly the purpose of my amendment. I was never satisfied with the clause which was adopted. I will say that frankly. It did not seem to me to be the best way to confine the assent to three of the principal allied and associated powers. It seemed to me that the only safe way was to secure the acceptance of our reservations by all the signatories prior to our deposit of ratification.

That is the sole purpose of the amendment to the resolution of ratification which I offer. It requires the assent of every signatory to the treaty, and provides that if objection is not made prior to the deposit of ratification by the United States a failure to make objection on the part of the signatories shall be taken as a full and complete acceptance of all the reservations of the United States. That covers every signatory, and does it in a perfectly friendly manner, because it is customary when reservations are made for a tacit assent to be all sufficient, and that must come before our deposit of ratification. If objection is not made before that time, their acceptance is final and complete of all our reservations. If objection is made, the United States stays out until they are accepted.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I very heartily agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that the original language of the resolution was not satisfactory. It may be that there is not any objection to the amendment, but several things have suggested themselves to me, and I should like to get some information, if any can be given by the Senator from Massachusetts or any other Senator, concerning what appear to me to be some objectionable features in the proposed language. The amendment provides:

And a failure on the part of the allied and associated powers to make objection to said reservations and understandings prior to the deposit of ratification by the United States shall be taken as a full and final acceptance of such reservations and understanding by said powers.

It has occurred to me that such a possibility or contingency as I am about to describe might arise. There are a great many signatories to this treaty.

Mr. LODGE. There are 32, I think.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; there are 32, I believe. Now, suppose that the President should immediately file the ratification as provided in the treaty, and that, as a matter of fact, perhaps, some of the powers would not have notice of just what the reservations were, and would not, perhaps, have time, as a matter of fact, to file any objections. It seems to me there might possibly arise a misunderstanding as to whether the other powers really had any notice which would afford them an opportunity to object if they desired to do so.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course, I have seen the danger of that possibility, but it seemed to me extremely remote. It is hardly conceivable that the President should deposit ratification so quickly that other powers would not have an opportunity to make objection. Of course, if the treaty is ratified, a statement of our action will go abroad and every power will at once be notified. I should think they would have plenty of time within which to make objections. The mere formalities incident to depositing the ratification will take some little time.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, that would consume some time, but I do not know how the various governments would, under their laws, be required to take official action on a proposition of this kind. It may be that it would consume some time, on account of the method that would have to be followed or because of some law under which a government would be required to pass on the question of acceptance.

If such a proposition were presented to the United States, I presume it would be the duty of the President to lay the matter before the Senate, as a part of the treaty-making power, and have them pass on it before he could say whether or not the United States Government accepted or rejected the reservations. That might take even more than the entire time allowed in this instance.

Mr. LODGE. That has not been the practice. The acceptance of reservations has been accomplished by act of the Executive.

Mr. NORRIS. Without consultation with the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. Without consultation. In the case of the treaty with Denmark by which the Virgin Islands were acquired a reservation was adopted which required an exchange of notes. That treaty had been submitted to the people of Denmark by a plebiscite; it had also passed both houses of the Rigsdag. That procedure had been followed in the case of the treaty itself, but the exchange of notes took place entirely between the Executives. The executive power of Denmark notified the President of the acceptance of the reservation by note, and thereupon the President proclaimed the treaty, and stated that he had received the acceptance. I think that is the general practice; that in the matter of reservations they are not referred to the parliamentary bodies. Of course, in Great Britain treaties are ratified by the executive power, in any event, but in the case of other powers, where some sort of ratification by the parliamentary body is required in connection with the treaties, I think, so far as I have been able to learn from the practice, that the executive action is considered sufficient in the matter of reservations.

Mr. NORRIS. I should think, as a matter of law, in our Government a very serious legal question would be involved that would really affect the validity of a treaty if the President should act and acquiesce in a reservation coming from some other country without the consent of the Senate, which is, under the Constitution, a part of the treaty-making power; because reservations, as in the case of the reservations we have adopted, in my judgment, frequently involve very important propositions.

Mr. LODGE. In this instance they involve very important propositions, but they relate entirely to the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that.

Mr. LODGE. Reservations, however, are not amendments.

Mr. NORRIS. No; and yet they sometimes have the same effect.

Mr. LODGE. Reservations, as a practical matter, always are in the line of reserving power to the Government making them, and do not involve the other powers at all.

Mr. NORRIS. I was using our Government only as an illustration. Suppose this treaty came from Great Britain or from France or from some other country to us after they had passed on it and attached reservations, the President would pass on those reservations, as the Senator from Massachusetts no doubt correctly states has been the custom, without submitting them to the Senate. If the other country reserved something that was material, something that in working out in actual practice might have the same effect as an amendment to the treaty, and the President approved it without submitting it to the Senate, and a question afterwards arose in reference to it, I entertain serious doubt whether we would, as a matter of law, have a treaty at all. That, however, probably will not arise in this instance.

Mr. LODGE. Let me, if I may, call attention to a case which, though not exactly a parallel one, of course, is yet in point: Twice our representatives at The Hague convention attached a reservation before signing the treaty. In one case, as I recall, the Senate specifically, when called upon to ratify the treaty, mentioned the reservation and embodied the reservation which had been made by the delegates in the ratification of the treaty. In the other case, I think, they took no notice of it, but simply ratified the convention as it stood without saying anything about our own reservation. The reservations which we made in those cases and also in another treaty were, so far as I know, simply accepted by the other powers by silence; that is, by acquiescence.

Mr. NORRIS. I can see how acquiescence in a proposition would make it valid and, in fact, might make valid a contract that otherwise would be invalid; but we say they must dissent or their silence will be taken as a consent, and that they must act within a certain time, which time is mainly under our control to such an extent that it might be possible even for us to make it physically impossible for them to comply with our own proposition.

Mr. LODGE. That could be met by fixing a time before which deposit should not be made.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I saw no other way, and it seemed to me practically not of particular importance, because the practice is so well established.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator suggested that if this were a case of Great Britain adopting like reservations and the Senate did not act upon them, it might invalidate the treaty; but I ask the Senator whether that could possibly be so in any case where acceptance may be by acquiescence through silence? The very failure to act constitutes an acceptance.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I agree to that proposition; but we say here that they must accept or reject before we do a certain thing or we will construe that their silence is acceptance. That is what this reservation says; and it still remains in our power to make it physically impossible for them, unless they act right offhand without much, if any, consideration, to comply with that condition.

Mr. LENROOT. May I suggest to the Senator that if the President of the United States should take such action, not giving the other parties an opportunity to object, they still would have a reasonable time after the deposit of ratification to object or we would not be in the treaty.

Mr. NORRIS. That would be a reasonable construction to put on it, but that would be contrary to what we are saying here. We can not, of course, bind another party to a contract by doing something ourselves that will make it physically impossible for the other party to comply with the stipulation that we lay down—that is true—and if such a situation should arise we would be in very serious difficulty in connection with this treaty, for in one view we would be in and in another view we would be out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the resolution of ratification. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The READING CLERK. On pages 1 and 2, commencing in line 12, it is proposed to strike out "by an exchange of notes as a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by at least three of the four principal allied and associated powers, to wit, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan," and insert "as a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by the allied and associated powers and a failure on the part of the allied and associated powers to make objection to said reservations and understandings prior to the deposit of ratification by the United States shall be taken as a full and final acceptance of such reservations and understandings by said powers."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I understand this amendment contemplates that before depositing the ratification the President of the United States will communicate the reservations or the action of the Senate to the various allied and associated powers, giving them a reasonable time before the deposit of ratification to signify their objection, if they care to do so. I desire to inquire whether that is the understanding?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; I proceeded on the assumption that of course a reasonable time would be given by the President.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And that the President would communicate to the allied and associated powers the action of the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. Exactly. Of course, I presumed he would do that, and it seemed to me so obvious that he would do it that it did not require special provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the resolution of ratification.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I now call up, if I may, the amendment that I offered to the ratification resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut offers an amendment to the resolution of ratification, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 1, line 7, after the words "United States," it is proposed to insert the following words:

Unless the instrument of ratification shall have been filed within 60 days after the adoption of the resolution of ratification by the Senate, nor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the amendment which I have offered would make the resolving portion of the resolution of ratification read as follows, so far as it relates to my proposed amendment:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, subject to the following reservations and understandings, which are hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States unless the instrument of ratification shall have been filed within 60 days after the adoption of the resolution of ratification by the Senate, nor until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted as a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by the allied and associated powers—

And so forth.

It will be observed that under the language of the amendment adopted a few moments ago the ratification is not to take effect until the reservations and understandings have been accepted by the other powers; and, under the same amendment—

A failure on the part of the allied and associated powers to make objection to said reservations and understandings prior to the deposit of ratification by the United States shall be taken as a full and final acceptance of such reservations and understandings by said powers.

As the resolution stands, there is no provision by which either this country or the other members of the league or any other power in the world will know when we are to get into this league if the treaty should be ratified. No definite date is set. It is, while perhaps not confusing, a more or less uncertain provision. In order to constitute ratification, we have provided that the powers must accept the reservations, and they must accept them before ratification takes place, but no time is named after which ratification shall take place.

There is no desire upon my part in any way to limit the powers of the President, and, of course, we could not do that if we wished. There is no intention upon my part to trench upon his jurisdiction in any way. I do think, however, that in a matter of this importance the United States should know within two months whether we are in the league or whether we are out of it, since so many things of great importance in the world may turn upon that fact.

The question just asked by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], for instance, is suggestive. There is no provision in the resolution, of course, that the President shall notify the powers. I do not think it is necessary to put that in. I am perfectly satisfied that the action of the Senate upon this reservation of ratification will be known in every capital of the world within 10 minutes after the Senate has acted, and all the powers will know exactly what the reservations are. They probably know now, and they can easily enough make up their minds within two months whether or not they want to file a protest. That would give them time, if desirable in their opinion, to advise and consult among themselves if they desired to take any action in the premises, and also to advise and consult with our State Department; but inasmuch as their protest, if they do protest, which is equivalent to a refusal to accept our reservations, is to defeat ratification, there should be some time within which both they and we know that they have liberty of action.

If my amendment shall be adopted, it does not mean that we will have to wait two months. It simply provides that the reservation of ratification shall not be binding upon this country unless within two months the instrument of ratification is filed. I want to say in passing that perhaps I have not used the conventional word to express the act when I say "filed." Perhaps it should be "deposited." That is immaterial, however. So I think that in the orderly operation of things it is desirable that there should be a time within which the President should file the instrument of ratification, if he intends to do so; and I think 60 days is ample time, in these days of wireless telegraphy and cable communication.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator, in the improbable condition of this treaty going to the President, and in the improbable condition of his accepting it, what would happen if he should fail to deposit the instrument of ratification within the 60 days, and an emergency should thereafter arise which might require its ratification?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. We would not be bound by the instrument of ratification if he should wait more than two months.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But suppose an emergency should arise, and it should become generally apparent that it was desirable to have ratification; what action could he take?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think he could take any action to get us into the league after two months. That is my interpretation of the amendment I have offered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator hold that he could then return the treaty to the Senate and have a modification?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I assume, from the form of the Senator's question, that he contemplates that the treaty would then have been returned to the President, and would be in his possession, and he could resubmit the treaty, I assume, either in the form in which he submitted it before, or in the form in which the Senate had ratified it, or in a modified form if the other parties agreed to it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. One more question: Why does the Senator think that the Senate at this time is a better judge of when the treaty should be deposited for ratification than the Executive, who has always heretofore had that judgment and that responsibility?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know that I do think it is a better judge. What I mean by that is this: We are acting upon the treaty now. No such provision as this could be put into the treaty by the President. I would not say that we were a better judge, but we are the only parties who can act in this matter if it is desirable to act.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This provision is meant to bind no one except the President. If the provision is omitted, the President can make the deposit of the instrument of ratification when he pleases, and this binds no one except him.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not like the language in which the Senator couches his statement. It is not intended to bind the President. It is the statement of the Senate, as a condition of its ratification, that if the United States is to be put into the league, it shall be done within 60 days.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that the attitude of the Senator from Nebraska is rather strange. He states that it is improbable that the treaty itself will be ratified, and improbable, even if it were, that the President would approve of it. Why is it material, then, from his standpoint, what form of ratification we do adopt? He said, furthermore, that some contingency might arise which, as I understood, might occasion the President to change his mind. Obviously, if the Senator speaks by authority, and we are going to kill the treaty, but if we do not, the President will kill it, what matters it what the form of the resolution may be?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I appreciate the force of the statement of the Senator from Utah, Mr. President; and yet, after all, in a matter of this great importance we must proceed in just as careful a manner in formulating the provisions of this great instrument as though we were sure it was to be ratified. Any other theory than that would be equivalent to saying that it did not matter what the Senate put in the treaty, and that all our talk about these reservations had been entirely immaterial. We must fix the document as our sound judgment tells us it should stand, on the assumption that it is going to be ratified. If we should reject the resolution of ratification, or if the President should think it was unwise to exchange ratifications after the action of the Senate, my present amendment would then be seen to have been an useless prudential precaution; but allow me to say this, also: I do not mean this as a parallel case, but there is a certain analogy between the condition in which a proposed amendment to the Constitution is left after it has been adopted by a two-thirds vote of both branches of Congress and submitted to the several States, and no time limit has been fixed within which the States ought to act, and ratifying this treaty and then turning it loose with no time limit fixed within which either the Congress or the country or the world can know what is to become of it.

The question asked by the Senator from Nebraska is quite suggestive of the position in which we might be. It seems to me quite plain that I would not want to be placed in the position suggested by the Senator from Nebraska. I do not think that the country would, if it understood in advance what that position might develop into. The Senator asks, supposing the President should hold this treaty, ratified by the Senate, for two months, under the impression that he was not going to exchange ratifications, and then, owing to the happening of some event or a change in his opinion, or, if it could possibly be conceived, another occupant of the office at that time having jurisdiction over it, an entirely different result might obtain, and it might then be the opinion of the Executive that the ratifications ought to be exchanged. The same condition might obtain in three months or six months. It might be that it would occur to the President that his decision of whether this country should become a member of this league or not ought to be postponed until the action of the two great national conventions of the two parties. Then we would have ratified the treaty and would be sitting here from now until the middle of next June, over three months, wondering whether we were in the league or out of the league, and all the world would wonder also.

It might be that, owing to a certain situation in Europe or Asia, the President would think he should wait until the expiration of his term of office, on March 4, 1921, and then, in view of the national election result, decide whether this country should go into the league or not. I do not impute any such intentions to the President at all. Of course, I know he would do his duty as he saw it. In the meantime I know in what a state of mind the Senators and the public and business men of this and every country would be. A great many tremendous contracts and business proposals, international export propositions, perhaps millions of invested wealth and wealth to be invested, the establishment of great commercial international carriers, and all sorts of commercial and business projects may be held up dependent upon whether we are in the league or not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I notice that the Senator from Connecticut now objects to this matter being held in suspense until after the election. I was of the impression that the Senator from Connecticut and his associates were rather in favor of the idea of submitting the question to the decision of the American people in the forthcoming election; that they rather desired a referendum.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator was quite correct in his opinion of my attitude upon it. If there is any proposition made to press the consideration of this proposal to put this country into the league after the Senate shall have rejected it for the third time, if they do, and in a third form, I should think it ought to be submitted to the whole people. I am in favor of having that done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Would not the proposed amendment of the Senator limit the President so that he could not submit it to the decision of the people in the forthcoming election?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator proposes that if it is not deposited before the election, it can not be deposited at all, so that the people would be deprived of the opportunity of passing upon it in the election.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, no. Now, Mr. President, as I view it, see how illogical the Senator is. If we do not ratify the treaty, there is nothing more to be said about it. If we do not ratify the treaty there is nothing more to be said about this present treaty now, as it is pending in the Senate. It will stand rejected.

What is to be said about it is to be said if we do ratify it; and that is the condition of things to which my amendment applies. If the Senate rejects the treaty, I assume what the President means in his letter to the Jackson Day dinner, advocating the taking of the proposal before a great and solemn referendum of the people of the country, is not taking this treaty as the Senate has amended it, and submitting it to the country, either to the country or the Senate; but it is, as he said, the question of repudiating the judgment of the Senate, which, as he expressed it, does not express the view of the American people, and going to the country upon the treaty which he submitted to the Senate, which he said should stand, and from which he says we have cut the heart. That is the issue the President intends to make.

Mr. President, if this resolution passes just as it is, the President can put us into the league at any time within two months. He having withheld exchange of ratifications, if he still wants to make the issue to the country, he goes with his influence, as the leader of his party, to his great national convention, freshly elected from the people on this issue, and he shapes his own plank and submits it to his party leaders, and then, by the regular processes of committees on resolutions, and so forth, to the great national convention, the representatives of the people who are to vote in the solemn referendum, they state what the issue shall be as raised by the Democratic Party. But that does not apply to this treaty which the Senate has now amended; it applies to some other treaty.

I do not care to argue this question at length, Mr. President. While it seemed to me desirable, it is not a matter in which I am particularly concerned or about which I have any pride of opinion. It is simply my view of what is due to us, what is due to the country and the other members of the league and the world. The others are in the league. If no country had ratified the treaty and they were all coming together, that would be one thing. But it has been said to us from the beginning that time was of the essence of this thing, and that all sorts of calamities and disorder were being promoted in the world by our delay in the matter.

I do not think there was any merit in that, because we have held this matter continually before the Senate, and in my opinion the delay has resulted simply from the insistence of the President that he would not accept changes which changed the principle anywhere, his party standing back of him on that basis. That has been the cause of the delay.

But now our delay is about to terminate, if it can properly be called delay, and, in view of the contentions of the party press of my friends across the aisle about the inordinate length of time that it has taken this country to make up its mind as to whether it would get into the league or not, if we allow the President, for reasons of his own, to have two months more for making up his mind, if anybody thinks it is not made up now, and for the members of the league to make up their mind, it seems to me that that can not reasonably be said to be too short a time. I do not think that it can reasonably be demanded that this matter should be passed to the White House, and there left indefinitely, so that at any time during the next year, or the rest of the President's term of office, he may put us into the league or keep us out of it at his pleasure.

As you know, Mr. President, when people are anxious about a thing of this kind the feeling is deep and is based on principle, and it is based upon what we consider an abandonment, or at least a change, in the continuous foreign policy of this country, unanimously hitherto maintained by every President from Washington to Wilson. When you consider that, it seems to me that the deep feeling, both of the proponents and of the opponents of this treaty, is entirely justified. It is the most fundamental thing the country has ever had under consideration since it formed the great charter which is the fundamental law of the country and which created the Federal Government.

If it is wise that the treaty should be ratified in its present form, and if it is ratified by the Senate, we can make up our minds that the President has kept perfectly close track of the arguments that have been made about it, and he is not going to require two months to make up his mind. I have no doubt that it is made up now. If it is not, I have no doubt that it will be finally made up within a week, and he can notify the other powers immediately, if he is going to file it, and within another week they will notify him by cable that the reservations are satisfactory to them or that they are not. He may tell them, "I want to act on this matter, in view of the urgency of the occasion, within the next 30 days, and the quicker you let me know whether you intend to make any protest, under the terms of the requirements of this preamble, to the Senate reservations or not, the quicker I can get into the league, if you are willing to accept the reservations." They will all know. The two great powers have come pretty near to announcing already what their position is.

There is no attempt to reflect upon the President in the passage of any law by Congress. It ought to be provided when it shall take effect.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator, for I am afraid I will forget the thought that is in my mind. I forgot it once. The Constitution gives the President only 10 days to consider the most important bills, and then he must return it if he intends to veto it.

I started to say that it is more or less analogous to the indeterminate condition in which we leave an amendment to the Constitution which we have passed by two-thirds of both branches of Congress and launched on a career through the legislatures of 48 States, with no time limit fixed within which those legislatures must act. So the country never knows until the amendment has been acted upon by the last necessary State what the organic law of the country is to be. There are amendments now floating around the country that were adopted nearly a hundred years ago by Congress, and if a few States adopt them now they will become part of our fundamental law. That condition of things ought not to exist, and I have attempted to remedy it in a joint resolution, which the Judiciary Committee has reported favorably and which is on the calendar.

Here is an international constitution, creating a proposed new order of things for the whole world. Many of us think it is unconstitutional. There is doubt whether, simply because you call it a treaty of peace, there is any constitutional warrant for making such a great international new constitution. All these uncertain things should not be rendered more uncertain by launching this forth to the world, especially when the preamble already provides that everybody who protests must protest before the ratification is deposited, but does not name any date when the instrument of ratification must be deposited.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Under our Constitution the President has equal power and right with the Senate in making treaties. Suppose the President, when he sent the treaty to the Senate, had put a limitation of 60 days, and said, "Oh, well, you have been keeping up with the treaty as I negotiated it; the Senate unquestionably is a sensible body, many of them have already made up their own minds, and 60 days will be ample time for the Senate to act upon this treaty, and I make this statement, that unless it is acted upon in 60 days, I shall withdraw it." What would the Senator from Connecticut have said to such a statement placed in his message by the President when he sent the treaty to us?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would say that I cordially and sincerely approve of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator would?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that is the case, why have not the majority acted upon this treaty in all the nine months, instead of two months as the Senator would want to confine the President?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think probably it is nearly 15 months that the matter has been under consideration. The President did have the power to say, "If this matter is not acted upon by the Senate within 30 or 60 or 90 days then I will withdraw the treaty." He can withdraw it to-day.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course he can.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not sure but that he will.

Mr. McKELLAR. But being a coordinate power, it would not have been becoming for the President to attempt to limit the Senate, and in like manner it would not be becoming in us to attempt to place a time limit upon the President for his action.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let us look at that. You must remember this whole treaty of 536 pages, printed in two languages, half that number of pages in each language, was made up by the President to satisfy himself. Nobody quarrels with him for that. That was his plain constitutional duty. He submitted it to us. He could have written into the treaty, if he had wanted to, that the treaty shall become effective, provided the Senate ratifies it within 90 days. He has formulated every one of the conditions under which we have been obliged to work. It is his treaty.

What we are doing is formulating the conditions under which we will agree to ratify the treaty, and, without the slightest idea or intention of trenching upon his authority, which I do not think this proposed amendment does, it seems to me clearly a proper condition precedent of the going into operation of the treaty to bind the United States, that we should say in the resolution of ratification that the treaty ratification must be filed within 60 days; that that is one of the conditions, together with the other reservations and understandings, that have been put on it; that this is practically one of the 15 or 16 understandings about it, and that the treaty does not go into effect and ratification—does not go into effect unless certain things are done.

I have no knowledge whether the provision is disagreeable to the President or not. I do not think it ought to be, and I do not think in practice it will have any effect unless, owing to some cause which I am unable to anticipate, but which I think is possible and ought to be provided against, the ratification should not be filed. I can see and I do see the difficulty of any business man or the people getting access to the President, almost the impropriety of their going to him and trying to get access to him to ask him whether it is his intention to file the resolution of ratification if it is passed.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. They ought at least to know that if it is to be done, it is going to be done within 60 days. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask the Senator from Connecticut if he does not think 60 days is a very limited time to consider the matter and to get the copies made and do all the things necessary to formally carry out the steps needed to put the treaty in official shape? His purpose would be accomplished, it seems, if he made it 90 days, which would be a much more reasonable space of time. Would the Senator object to making it 90 days instead of 60?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I do not. I do not think it is necessary, but I am not so sure of my own judgment as to be insistent about it. In view of the fact that our ocean greyhounds are constantly going back and forth over the ocean, like shuttles in a mill, consuming only five days for the trip, in view of the fact that the cables and wireless telegraph are working like lightning every five seconds, when I drafted the amendment, without at that time having considered that this question of time for the other signatories to make up their minds whether they would accept the reservations or not had arisen, I did think that 30 days would be sufficient, and I had that time specified in the amendment which I offered and had printed. But the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] in conversation with me yesterday said, "I approve of the principle of your proposed amendment, but I think the time is too short in view of the fact that these other people have got to protest if they want to, and I think you ought to make it 60 days." I said, "I will do so." I am perfectly willing to make it 90 days, although I do not think it is necessary, but I do think that some reasonable time ought to be fixed. Ninety days will be one-quarter of a year. I presume the Senator from Florida himself thinks that that would be ample time. I will modify the amendment in that respect and make it 90 days.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is much basis for the argument made by the Senator from Connecticut, and undoubtedly there is an element of uncertainty about the provision as it stands, but I want to submit for his consideration this thought.

Of course, telegraphic communication now extends to the ends of the earth, but obviously something in the nature of a formal communication would be necessary. In other words, no foreign government would be justified in acting upon a mere newspaper report or telegraphic advices. It could not reasonably be expected to act before it had the authentic document concerning which its assent was expected.

Aside from that, I want to say to the Senator that in the case of a great many of these countries action is necessary by their legislative bodies in order to bind the government in any wise whatever. I should very naturally think that the submission of these reservations to the various governments whose assent is required would provoke discussion in the legislative assemblies much after the manner that we have listened to in this body for a long time. Some particular nation might not be in a position to act within the limit fixed by the proposed amendment by reason of delays in assembling the legislative body or by reason of protracted debate in that body concerning the action which ought to be taken.

Suppose under those circumstances a nation should address a polite communication to the President of the United States advising him of the situation of affairs and saying to him that it was going on, but they expected to reach a definite conclusion in about 2 weeks or 30 days; the President of the United States would have no discretion in the matter at all, and the treaty would fail, would it not?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The ratification could not be deposited after three months. I have not thought of it exhaustively, but I have given some consideration to the facts to which the Senator alludes. He says that in a great many of the countries legislative action is or may be necessary. I do not think that is so. My impression is that in by far the greater number of the countries their treaties are made by their chief executive and their state department or their cabinet. There are one or two—I believe France is one—where the action of either their senate or their chamber of deputies is required.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me inquire of the Senator whether even in the case of those in which the power does exist it is not altogether likely that the executive, particularly if he is a parliamentary executive, would want to have the views of the parliamentary body concerning the advisability of accepting the reservations?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That may be quite so. It may be that some other country would. I do not think Great Britain would require any such thing, but there may be countries where some legislative opinion would be necessary. But we all know that in all the other countries that have parliamentary government it is the ministry which is in control, a ministry the stability of which depends upon its being backed and supported by a majority of its own belief in the legislative assembly. So Lloyd-George, in the negotiations of the treaty, being the leader of the House of Commons and the Premier of Great Britain, was able in no time at all to have whatever he did ratified by his party of which he was the leader. They consult with them in advance; they tell them, "Here, we are thinking about this"; they call in the leaders of the party on the floor, and they say, "This proposition is made; what attitude shall we take?" They agree upon it, and the minister walks in at the minister's bench and announces it, and the party O. K's it, and it is done, or else the Government falls.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator, of course, will remember that they have the power to interrogate the minister; that is, a member of the opposition to the ministry arises and asks the premier whether it is a fact that such a communication has been received from the President of the United States submitting the treaty and the reservations, and whether it is a fact that the premier intends to accept the treaty or file a protest, and immediately that precipitates debate in the House of Commons.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It does, and the moment the leader of the ministerial forces on the floor has had enough of that debate he brings it to a vote. They do not have the unlimited debate which exists under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Just a moment, please. Whenever the party leader wants the question determined upon he either moves the previous question, or the Chair does not recognize the opposition; the debate comes to an end.

I also want to call to the Senator's attention the fact that in every one of those capitals there are diplomatic officials subject to the order of the President over the wireless immediately to communicate at once with the State Department or the office of foreign relations in those countries, and those things coordinated in that way, coming to a central office by cable instructions dispatched to our corps of ambassadors and ministers among those 32 signatory powers and getting answers to them in a day or two, they would take it right up, and in a week we would know, in my opinion, whether this was going to be accepted or not; and I say most of them will never be submitted to any legislative body at all.

I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Conceding that the Senator from Montana has in the illustration he used a moment ago presented a case of serious difficulty, does that illustration not make it manifest that it was unwise to abandon the language of the original Lodge resolution of ratification? That resolution required affirmative action. The present resolution proposes that ratification shall be taken by virtue of a mere failure to act. If, as the Senator from Montana anticipates, a long time may elapse during which the question is under discussion, does not that make it imperative that we should require affirmative action so that no nation hereafter can come in and say: "We did not file our protest because of certain conditions," such as the Senator has suggested?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will say to the Senator that that water has gone by the mill; we have already adopted an amendment that takes care of that; that is, the Senate has committed itself to the other view.

Mr. REED. Have we adopted any part of the Lodge resolution?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. REED. That must have taken place very early in the session to-day, for I was here within 10 minutes after the hour of meeting.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will say to the Senator from Missouri, in reply to his inquiry, that it was not at my suggestion or with my advice and consent that the original Lodge resolution, as to how the acceptance of our reservations by the other signatory powers should be accomplished, was modified. I originally took the view that in a matter of this vital importance it was exceedingly desirable to obtain from the agreeing parties a positive statement from which there would be no escape, a writing deposited in their archives and in ours, stating that they accepted our reservations and were bound by them; but, Mr. President, it was stated that as to some of our reservations, while it was not known that other governments would protest against them, yet, owing to situations in their own governments, they did not want positively and in writing to say that they were acceptable to them. So, I presume, in order to be more polite to them, while at the same time following, perhaps, what was considered the equivalent of the other resolution, and in order to make it more persona grata and an easier task for the other signatories, the substitute was agreed upon.

I do not know as to that, and I am not satisfied that the doctrine of estoppel applies in international affairs to sovereigns as it does to litigants in a court. As the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] suggests, the statute of limitations applies in a court but does not run against international obligations; but, however that may be, there is no use of our arguing, because it is merely our assertion that we will consider that the reservations have been accepted by the other powers unless they protest. We say, "Inasmuch as we told you in advance that we will consider that your silence gives consent, you are estopped." That is merely our construction of our own resolution; it is not their agreement.

It may be said with great force that inasmuch as we have said to them in advance what our understanding is, if they admit us to the league on those conditions, and proceed to execute a contract with any such provision, they could not deny it; but suppose they should; all we could say is "You are no gentlemen," or else we could get out of the league or adopt some other recourse that we might think appropriate.

Furthermore, the original resolution would have been much more expeditious, because it provided that by an exchange of diplomatic notes between the three or four principal allied and associated powers the reservations were to be accepted, and it was stated that if those three or four allied and associated powers, who had been our associates in the conduct of the war, agreed, that that was all we cared about; that they were the nations which had won the war, and if they agreed to our reservations we would take a chance about the others disputing it or differing from us. But, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] stated to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], that water has gone over the dam; we have agreed to the substitute amendment.

Now, I say that to me there is little objectionable force in the claim that the other signatories can not do whatever is necessary to make up their own minds or determine whether they will keep still within 90 days. All they have got to do, if they want to agree to the reservations under the language of the preamble, is to do nothing. Then we say, "You have not protested, and, under the terms of our proposition to you, you have accepted." It is only in the event they want to protest that it takes any time at all to formulate their protest. It must be borne in mind that if any one of the 32 signatories files a protest against these reservations the ratification is not to take place. If the ruler of Hedjaz or of Salvador, who may not like the information recently obtained about our interpretation of the Monroe doctrine, files a protest against our reservations, the treaty does not get ratified. Let me read the language.

Mr. McLEAN rose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. McLEAN. Under the provisions of the amendment which has just been adopted, the protest must be filed prior to the deposit of ratification, and under the amendment suggested by my colleague the deposit must be made within 60 days.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have modified that, making it 90 days.

Mr. McLEAN. I was going to suggest that there might be cases where special sessions of the legislative branch of the Government might be necessary, which might require some notice, and it would seem to me that 90 days would be preferable.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The suggestion is a wise one, and the change has been made.

Under the amendment just adopted to the original resolution the manner in which the powers shall give their consent and file their protest against the reservations is provided. Here is the language:

Which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States—

Then I skip my proposed amendment—

until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted as a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by the allied and associated powers.

That means all of the allied and associated powers; the ratification does not take effect until our reservations have been accepted by all the allied and associated powers, and upon the mere sending of a telegram by any one of them all these 15 months of treaty discussion have been rendered nugatory and futile. I am not complaining of that, because I am not anxious that ratification should take effect; but I believe the interpretation I have just given was stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, the author of this modification, on the floor this morning as his interpretation, and it has been agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I merely wish to ask the Senator his interpretation of this language. He said a moment ago that the amendment which had been adopted by the Senate—the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]—as it reads requires the affirmative action of all the allied and associated powers. Does he not interpret the following——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I beg the Senator's pardon; he has misunderstood me. I say the reservations will be accepted unless the other nations protest against them.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; and their silence or their failure to enter protest before the deposit of ratification is taken as acceptance and estops them from any further objection.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly; it is so stated in the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The thought that I caught from the Senator's expression was that it took affirmative action on the part of all of the allied and associated Governments.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I do not say it takes affirmative action. Let me again quote the language to the Senator, because this is important, and if I have made an incorrect statement I want to be corrected. The language is:

> Which ratification is not to take effect until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted as a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by the allied and associated powers.

I say that means by all the allied and associated powers. It goes on and states:

> And a failure on the part of the allied and associated powers to make objection to said reservations and understandings prior to the deposit of ratification by the United States shall be taken as a full and final acceptance of such reservations and understandings by said powers.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Therefore the Senator's interpretation is that if there is no affirmative action nor any filing of any protest at the time of deposit the Government that has failed to act either by way of protest or by affirmation ipso facto acquiesces in the reservations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I say that is what we claim about it; that is what we state shall happen; but they have said nothing one way or the other, and are not required to do so. They may keep absolutely mum; and we state, "If you keep mum, it will be our interpretation of this instrument that you have accepted the reservations, and if you do not want to accept them, the only way you can prevent our considering that you have accepted them is by filing a protest before the ratifications are exchanged."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him further, it seems to me, in view of the limitation effected by the Lodge amendment, that it would be fairer for all parties concerned in such a serious matter as this league covenant to say that when the United States shall have deposited the ratifications that is the final action and the final limit of time on our part. Then there will be no restriction as to the reservations, except the judgment of those who are the most vitally interested, namely, the United States, in reference to the nations to which they are sent; but if, on the other hand, we establish a 90-day limitation, it seems to me it would bear something of the aspect of saying, "We do not want this thing anyhow, and if you do not hurry and get in we are going to wash our hands of the whole business."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not think we need be intimidated—I will not use that word—I do not think that we need be overanxious about fearing to give them the impression that we are unduly desirous of going into this thing. If I have any conception of the English language, a casual perusal of the reservations which we have already adopted might tend to induce a sensitive and oversuspicious partner to think that we were not actuated by an uncontrollable enthusiasm for his company.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That we have some mental reservations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But there is no accounting for tastes, and they may be under the impression that we are burning up with the ardor of a young lover to re-form the alliance that was severed 140 years ago and now stretch our hands across the sea to abandon the independence of the United States of America and become a member of the grand congress of the rough riders and militarists of the world. But, as I say, that will be for them, and if they are able to control themselves against filing a protest on these reservations—and I think they will be—and if the President's mind should "go along" with the Senate's, and if the Senate should ratify the treaty, we will all be in together over there.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I simply want to ask the Senator whether I correctly understood him to state that if one of the various powers should file a protest it would operate to prevent the treaty from being put into operation?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why, of course. That is the language. That is what the Senator from Massachusetts stated on the floor—that the other reservations required the assent only of four of the principal allied and associated powers, and named them—Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan—but that this required the consent of all of them; and when it says "the consent of the principal allied and associated powers" it can not mean anything else but all of the allied powers. If the action of one of them in filing a protest against the reservations did not break up the unanimity of the action of the allied and associated powers and the constructive consent, how many of them would it take to protest in order to break it up? It follows ex vi termini; it must be so.

Mr. President, I have spent a great deal longer time than I intended to spend on this very simple subject, and I do not care to occupy any more time upon it. I would not have taken so much except for the fact that I have had to answer questions that Senators desired to ask me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE].

Mr. McKELLAR. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	Lodge	Shields
Ball	Glass	McCormick	Simmons
Beckham	Gore	McKellar	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Gronna	McLean	Smith, Md.

France	Kirby	Robinson	Watson
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Sheppard	Williams
Gay	Lenroot	Sherman	Wolcott

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut will not be adopted. To limit the President to 60 days in passing upon, transmitting, and filing the resolution of ratification is putting entirely too short a time limit upon him to act upon this matter of such great importance.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator knows, I assume, that I have changed it to 90 days?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I really did not know that. There was so much confusion in the Senate Chamber that it was rather difficult to keep up with what was going on in the Senate; but I do not believe that we should restrict the President at all. We have heard quite a good deal during the past several months in regard to alleged encroachments upon the part of the President upon the prerogatives of the Senate in dealing with this very problem—the treaty. Judging from their expressions, a great many Senators seem to think that the Executive should not be considered at all in dealing with the treaty. I do not, however, entertain so harsh a view. I entertain the view that it is a matter where there should be cooperation as far as possible, and that the executive and legislative branches of the Government should endeavor to harmonize and to compromise their views where they have differences upon any important matter of this kind; but, of course, if they can not do that, then it is the duty of a United States Senator to vote his convictions—to stand up as a man—just the same as it is the duty of the Executive of the United States to stand firmly and courageously for his convictions. I admire a man who makes up his own mind and then has the courage of his convictions.

I do not see that it is properly within our prerogatives to try to hedge about the Executive in dealing with the final disposition of this subject after it has passed from the Senate. We have occupied months and months in its consideration; now, all at once, some want to get in haste. After taking some 8 or 10 months for consideration on the part of the Senate, we now say that we must make haste, but we do not propose to do it as far as the Senate is concerned, but we propose to tell the President: "You must act very quickly in the matter." I believe it would be another step that would probably make more impossible the ratification of the treaty.

While a good many reservations have been adopted that I did not support, and some that I did support, I have come to the conclusion that in order to try to preserve at least a part of the purpose and the object of the establishment of a League of Nations I shall vote for a resolution of ratification with these reservations, although some of them are objectionable to me.

I do this because I think, Mr. President, that we yet have something of the league left. The President, when he forced it and brought about this concerted effort on the part of the Nation to bring about a condition which it was hoped would result in peace for the Nation, result in a new order of affairs, instead of continuing the old order of settling your difficulties with a shotgun, performed a great service by his own country and by the nations of the earth.

It is true it has been changed more or less. I have favored some of the changes. But I still believe, Mr. President, that there remains enough of good in the plan of the League of Nations for us to give it a trial. I am opposed to putting anything else into it that would make more improbable the ultimate adoption of the treaty and of the League of Nations.

Therefore I hope that the limitation offered by the Senator from Connecticut will not be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE].

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. I ask that this announcement stand for the day. On this question I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is absent on account of illness, and I have been unable to secure a transfer of that pair. I therefore must withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (after having voted in the negative). I notice from the recapitulation that the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] did not vote. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 42, as follows:

So Mr. BRANDEGEE's amendment to the resolution of ratification was rejected.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, we are once more to vote on a final resolution of ratification of the peace treaty. Once more we have a combination between President Wilson's followers in the Senate and the irreconcilable foes of the treaty, which is said to be sufficiently strong to defeat ratification.

Who would have thought a year ago that the time would come when the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] would be found fighting together to defeat this treaty?

The Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] have made a great fight to defeat the treaty, but President Wilson is the man who defeats it if it is defeated to-day.

The course followed by President Wilson and his followers in the Senate commands the admiration of no one. They propose, if they can, to kill the entire treaty and maintain a state of war with Germany for another year, because the majority of the Senate, representing an overwhelming majority of the American people, will not permit them to destroy the liberties and the independence of the people of the United States.

When this treaty was presented to us by President Wilson we were told that failure of the Senate to ratify it would break the heart of the world. But now that reservations have been adopted which our principal associates in the war are willing to accept, and are eager for ratification with such reservations, President Wilson declares that unless obligations are incurred by the United States that are not insisted upon by others, we must not ratify, even though "the heart of the world be broken."

I wish now to review very briefly our status in the League of Nations if the treaty be now ratified as proposed with the pending reservations:

Beginning with the league covenant, we read articles 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7. The reservations we have adopted do not affect any of these seven articles except in two particulars. The reservation regarding the right of withdrawal affects the first article, but this reservation is in exact accord with the interpretation given the article by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and many other Democratic Senators who are following President Wilson.

The fourteenth reservation also affects these articles, but if President Wilson desires to take the position that the treaty is nullified unless we agree that the British Empire shall have 6 votes to bind us when we have only 1 vote to bind them, we are willing that a solemn referendum be had upon that question and let the people decide.

The next article is 8, which is affected by our tenth reservation, which provides that the United States, when engaged in war or threatened with invasion, shall have the right to increase its armament without the consent of the council of the league, if it has adopted the plan for disarmament recommended.

Who is there opposed to that? What Senator is there who would dare to face an American audience and say he opposed the ratification of the treaty because we reserved the right to increase our armament in time of war?

We next come to article 9, which the reservations do not affect in the slightest degree.

The next is article 10. President Wilson insists that we must solemnly obligate ourselves with all our man power and all our resources to protect the territorial integrity and political independence of every other member of the league against external aggression. He says this is the bulwark of the league covenant, and without it he states the covenant might be nothing more than a scrap of paper. He explicitly says we must assume the obligation and agree to contribute all of our moral and material resources to its fulfillment. Here is the crucial issue in the contest. Shall we obligate our boys to fight and to die in every quarrel that may arise in every part of the globe? Shall we obligate ourselves to finance every war that may hereafter occur in Europe or in Asia? President Wilson, gratuitously insulting France, says the military party is now in control there. He also charges Italy with imperial designs. Strangely enough, it is only the British Empire and Japan, who are actually carrying out imperialistic designs, who do not meet with his condemnation!

The President says this article 10 is the heart of the covenant. He prefers to see the whole treaty defeated rather than have our boys relieved from the obligation to go to war across the seas; rather than have us released from the obligation to finance one side or the other in all the wars of the future. And—God save the mark—he says this is the essence of Americanism.

Was it for this that Washington fought and thousands died?

If we follow President Wilson, we must banish the Star-Spangled Banner and America from our national songs. For if article 10 be accepted each of these great anthems will breathe a lie. For nearly 150 years freedom—liberty—has been the foundation of our greatness. Each Congress has had freedom of action under the Constitution. To bind future Congresses to make war against the will of the people is a monstrous proposition. To engage to protect tyranny from peoples fighting for liberty is contrary to every principle upon which our Government is founded.

On November 19 last I said in this Chamber that I would resign my seat in the Senate before I would vote to ratify this treaty with the obligations imposed by article 10. I repeat that statement to-day.

Article 11 is the next article of the league covenant. The reservations do not affect in any degree that article. It is to my mind one of the most important articles in the league covenant, because under it we as a member of the league agree that we will meet and discuss in the council or the assembly matters affecting the peace of the world, but there is no authority vested in either league or assembly to bind or obligate anyone.

President Wilson, before he became so isolated from the world, said of this article:

I want to call your attention, if you will turn to it when you go home, to article 11, following article 10, of the covenant of the League of Nations. That article, let me say, is the favorite article in the treaty, so far as I am concerned.

Then he proceeds to detail the very great benefits to be derived by the world because of the presence of that article in the treaty. As I have said, the reservations leave article 11 intact.

President Wilson's illness seems to have affected either his recollection or his judgment, or both.

The next articles in the treaty are 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16, and they are all grouped together and relate to arbitration, compulsory inquiry concerning disputes, the agreement not to go to war within nine months after the submission of a dispute, and economic boycott for the violation of any of the provisions of articles 12, 13, or 15.

These articles, Mr. President, warrant the United States in entering the League of Nations, and with these articles great progress will be made toward the prevention of war. The articles to which I have just referred are not affected by the pending reservations except in two particulars: The fourth reservation reserves to the United States the right to decide for itself what are domestic questions not to be submitted to the league, and the eleventh reservation permits us to trade, notwithstanding the economic boycott, with nationals of a covenant-breaking State residing within the United States or in neutral countries. In all other respects these articles are left intact by the reservations.

What was the view of President Wilson before his illness of the importance of these articles?

On September 4 last, at Indianapolis, he said, speaking of the league covenant:

The great bulk of the provisions of that covenant contain these engagements and promises on the part of the States which undertake to become members of it: That in no circumstances will they go to war without first having done one or the other of two things—without first either having submitted the question to arbitration, in which case they agree to abide by the result, or having submitted the questions to discussion by the council of the League of Nations, in which case they will allow six months for the discussion, and engage not to go to war until three months after the council has announced its opinion upon the subject under dispute. The heart of the covenant of the league is that the nations solemnly covenant not to go to war for nine months after a controversy has become acute.

Is it possible that the President Wilson who uttered these words is the same man who now says the heart of the covenant is in article 10, and this provision that he then said constituted the heart of the covenant will be only a scrap of paper? Has President Wilson changed his mind or has his mind changed him?

To the followers of the President, who propose now to vote to reject this treaty, I remind them that they vote to reject a treaty the very heart of which, according to President Wilson before his illness, is unaffected by the reservations.

Articles 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21 are not affected by the reservations.

Article 22 is affected by the third reservation, which provides that no mandate shall be accepted by the United States without the consent of Congress.

In voting to reject this treaty, do the Senators who are following the President take the position that they are against the treaty because they want the President of the United States to accept a mandate for Armenia, a mandate for Turkey, or a mandate for any other country, without the consent of Congress?

Who among you will be foolhardy enough to take that position before the American people?

The next article is 23. That article is not affected except by our fourth reservation, which excludes our own labor problems from the jurisdiction of the league.

Articles 24, 25, and 26 are not affected in the slightest degree by these reservations.

I have now briefly reviewed our status in the League of Nations if the treaty is ratified with these reservations.

The heart of it, as denominated by President Wilson last September, will be left. The beneficial articles for the settling of disputes by arbitration and inquiry will be left intact. What is it that will be taken away so far as the United States is concerned? Obligations only—obligations imposed by this covenant contrary to the principles of this Republic; obligations that no American citizen ought to be willing for a moment to have imposed upon the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield for a question only.

Mr. REED. That I may give my question a meaning——

Mr. LENROOT. Last night the Senator desired a vote at the earliest possible moment. I do not wish to occupy any further time of the Senate than is absolutely necessary. So I must request the Senator to put his interrogatory pointedly.

Mr. REED. Having understood the Senator to say that until the President became ill he had never declared that article 10 was the heart of the covenant, I want to ask him if he does not know that on September 11 in his speech at Helena, Mont., the President said these words:

Then comes article 10——

Mr. LENROOT. I do not yield further. I am ready to answer the question; yes.

Mr. REED. And he said that it was the heart of the covenant then, did he not?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. The heart of the covenant changed its place many times on that western trip of the President of the United States, but never before his illness did the President say that what he said at Indianapolis was the heart of the covenant would be nothing but a scrap of paper, which he has since said.

Mr. FRANCE. I desire to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield for a question.

Mr. FRANCE. Does the Senator think the treaty ever had a heart? [Laughter.]

Mr. LENROOT. I think speculation upon that point perhaps would not be very valuable to either the Senator from Maryland or myself. I have already stated what I believed to be the beneficial part of the league covenant that, in my judgment, well warrants us in entering the league, provided the other obligations are not assumed.

Now, I wish hastily to review the reservations themselves. The first one, as I have said, relates to withdrawal and provides that the United States shall be the sole judge of whether its international obligations have been fulfilled entitling us to withdraw from the league. In other words, we deny any power in the League of Nations to keep us there against our will if we desire to withdraw. This reservation was adopted by a vote of 45 to 20—35 Republicans and 10 Democrats voting for it, and 20 Democrats voting against it.

The next reservation relieves us of all obligations under article 10 except the obligation to respect the territorial integrity and political independence of other members of the league. It relieves us from any obligation to go to war, to use our resources, or interfere in any way in controversies of other nations relating to territorial integrity or political independence. In other words, it leaves the people of the United States free to determine for themselves what if any action they will take in these matters in the future.

This reservation was adopted by a vote of 56 to 26. Forty-two Republicans and 14 Democrats voted for it, and 26 Democrats voted against it.

In this connection, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert as a part of my remarks the pending resolution of ratification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the third reservation relates to mandates. I discussed that a moment ago. Under it a mandate can not be accepted without the consent of Congress.

It was adopted by a vote of 68 to 4—39 Republicans and 29 Democrats voting for it, and 4 Democrats against it.

The fourth reservation relates to domestic questions. It declares that the United States alone will determine what are domestic questions, and that no question which it determines to be such shall be submitted to the league. Without this reservation, the league could determine this and might undertake to interfere with our domestic problems of vital importance to us. President Wilson and his followers insist that the league shall be given this power. This is one of the matters upon which the President desires a great and solemn referendum; but I venture to say that if so submitted there are very few Democrats who would dare support the President's position, or face an audience and advocate it.

The vote on this reservation was 56 to 25—42 Republicans and 14 Democrats voting for it, and 25 Democrats voting against it.

The fifth reservation relates to the Monroe doctrine, and the same observation can be made with respect to this that I have made with respect to the fourth reservation. The United States has always interpreted the Monroe doctrine. President Wilson and his followers would submit the interpretation to the League of Nations.

This reservation was adopted by a vote of 58 to 22—41 Republicans and 17 Democrats voting for it, and 22 Democrats against it.

The sixth reservation withholds our assent from the cession of Shantung by Germany to Japan.

President Wilson insists that we shall condone—not only condone but participate in this great wrong. He evidently has one rule of conduct for Europe and a different rule for Asia. He threatened to withdraw the treaty from the Senate if Italy was given her claims on the Adriatic concerning which there are honest differences of opinion, but insists that we assent to the robbery of China, which no one defends.

The vote on this reservation was 48 to 21—39 Republicans and 9 Democrats voting for it, and 21 Democrats against it.

What do the Senators think would be the result of a solemn referendum upon this reservation?

The seventh reservation covers the appointment of representatives of the United States in the League of Nations, and the various agencies under its jurisdiction, and upon the various commissions provided for in the treaty.

It was adopted by a vote of 55 to 14—38 Republicans and 17 Democrats voting for it, and 14 Democrats against it.

The eighth reservation relates to the reparation commission and provides that we will not submit to the control of our commerce with Germany by that commission without the consent of Congress.

It was adopted by a vote of 41 to 22. It was supported by 35 Republicans and 6 Democrats, 22 Democrats voting against it.

The ninth reservation provides that the United States shall not be obligated to contribute to the general expenditures of the league unless appropriations therefor are made by Congress.

It was adopted by a vote of 46 to 25. Of the 46 votes for it, 38 were Republicans and 8 were Democrats. Twenty-five Democrats voted against it.

The tenth reservation relates to disarmament and provides that if any plan for disarmament recommended by the council is adopted by Congress the United States reserves the right in time of war or when threatened with invasion to increase such armanent without the consent of the council of the League of Nations.

I have already discussed this reservation. It was adopted by a vote of 49 to 26. Forty Republicans and 9 Democrats voted for it, and 26 Democrats voted against it.

The eleventh reservation reserves from the economic boycott under article 16 the right to permit commercial relations with nationals of the covenant-breaking State residing in the United States and in countries other than the covenant-breaking nation.

This reservation was adopted by a vote of 44 to 28. Thirty-nine Republicans and 5 Democrats voted for it, and 28 Democrats voted against it.

The twelfth reservation relates to the rights of American citizens in property claimed to be of German ownership. It was adopted by a vote of 45 to 27. Thirty-seven Republicans and 8 Democrats voted for it, and 27 Democrats voted against it.

The thirteenth reservation withholds our assent to the labor provisions of part 13 of the treaty, but leaves Congress free to accept them in the future if it desires so to do.

The purpose of this reservation is the protection of American labor. Our labor standards are the highest in the world. We should be careful that there be no tendency to lower our standards by joining with other nations to agree upon a uniform standard which would be certain to be lower than our own. Moreover, American labor is patriotic, devoted to our American institutions. Europe is in chaos and turmoil. Whether Bolshevism and anarchy shall dominate the labor of Europe we do not know. We do know they will never dominate the labor of America. Is it not the part of wisdom to wait and find out what kind of a labor combination will be formed before we go into it?

This reservation was adopted by a vote of 44 to 27. Thirty-eight Republicans and 6 Democrats voted for it. Twenty-seven Democrats voted against it.

The fourteenth reservation is the voting-equality reservation, whereby the United States assumes no obligation until the league covenant is so amended as to give us a number of votes equal to that of any other power, to be bound by any action of the council or the assembly where any member having self-governing dominions or colonies has in the aggregate cast more than one vote, or, where the United States and that power are parties to the dispute, any of them have voted at all.

Do you who are following President Wilson desire a solemn referendum to decide whether the British Empire shall have six votes to bind us when we have only one vote to bind them? Candidly, how many votes do you think President Wilson would get upon such a referendum?

It should be observed that the reservation does not deny the colonies the right to vote. If this treaty is ratified with these reservations, Canada will have the undoubted right to vote upon every question that she would have without the reservation. It relates only to binding us when an unequal number of votes is cast.

This reservation was adopted by a vote of 57 to 20. It was supported by 41 Republicans and 16 Democrats. Twenty Democrats voted against it.

The next and last reservation, Mr. President, is the fifteenth reservation, adopted on yesterday, relating to Ireland. We were afforded a most curious spectacle in the Senate during the long hours of debate on yesterday. It was well known that there was practically no opposition to an expression of sympathy for the aspirations of Ireland for freedom and independence, but upon the other side of the aisle Senators insisted upon coupling with that expression a doctrine of self-determination entirely new to the United States; a doctrine which it was frankly admitted by the Senator from Idaho and others had never been upheld by the United States in the past; a contention, Mr. President, that it took four long years of war to settle, and we had supposed that it was settled for all time. If I had voted against the amendment to strike from that reservation the principle of self-determination I would not know what answer to make to those few remaining, now very nearly at the sunset of life, who fought through the Civil War to preserve this Union against the doctrine of secession and self-determination.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. I think the only answer that can be made is that the men of the South chose the wrong word; instead of calling it "secession" they ought to have called it "the assertion of the right of self-determination."

Mr. LENROOT. I think so; they are exactly the same.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. FRANCE. Does the Senator make no distinction between the War of the Revolution and the War of the Rebellion?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes, I do; but the doctrine, as was admitted by everyone who spoke in its favor yesterday, was not the doctrine of the Revolution; it was the doctrine of secession; the right of self-determination of a people belonging to or forming a part of a nation; and if it is true, the same doctrine must be applied to-day to the right of New York or the right of California to secede from the Union, if they desire, under the doctrine of self-determination.

Mr. FRANCE. I see that the Senator makes no distinction between the two.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator can draw his own conclusions. I voted against this reservation yesterday because of its inclusion of this new and dangerous doctrine. The Senate never would have thought for one moment of adopting it if it had not been for the belief that there would be some party politics involved in it. They thought they would put somebody in a hole. But that was a declaration of policy, so far as the United States was concerned; and, as I have said, so far as the reservation concerned Ireland there was no opposition. I have gone upon record as against this policy, this destructive policy of self-determination that Senators voted for. Having gone on record, I am going to vote to ratify the treaty to-day with this fifteenth reservation in it.

Mr. President, there were many pretended friends of Ireland upon the floor of the Senate yesterday. We will find out where the friends of Ireland are to-day. The Senator from Nebraska

[Mr. HITCHCOCK] made a very touching appeal of sympathy for Ireland and advocated this reservation. The Senator, and those associated with him, were willing to make some motions that would amount to nothing; but when it is placed in the treaty, where, if the treaty is ratified, it would have some effect in securing freedom for Ireland, I am afraid we are going to find most of these pretended friends of Irish freedom voting against the treaty and destroying the reservation that they so eloquently defended yesterday.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; the Senator from California is one of them, I am afraid. I hope not.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator from Wisconsin should not anticipate my action. However, I am in a position which I suppose the Senator will commend, at any rate, of being perfectly——

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator will permit me, I said to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that I could only take time for the propounding of a question, and I must ask that that request be observed, because I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate unduly.

Mr. PHELAN. I have no intention of trespassing upon the Senator's time, but I wish to ask him this question: He said that when certain Senators voted yesterday on the resolution recognizing the principle of self-determination, especially as it applied to Ireland, it was the intention to make political capital or "put somebody in a hole." I ask the Senator now whether he is aware that on the final vote 25 Democrats voted in the affirmative and 20 Republicans, while 20 Republicans voted in the negative and 18 Democrats? So, when he makes that accusation, he necessarily includes some Members on the other side of the aisle.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, I do. Upon this matter there is not a party alignment, as the Senator from California well knows. There are divisions upon the other side, and there are divisions upon this side; and it is the desire of a considerable number of Senators upon this side to add any reservation that they think will assist in defeating the treaty. There are also Senators upon the other side, who heretofore have pretended to be the best friends of the treaty, who are now bending every effort to defeat it. I am not referring to the Senator from California.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. I am inclined to think that perhaps we may have another "battalion of death," and it may be recruited on this side.

Mr. LENROOT. I think so, too. I think, when the vote is taken, that will be absolutely determined.

Mr. President, I have gone over these reservations that President Wilson says nullify the treaty. These are the reservations because of which his followers in the Senate propose to reject the treaty to-day.

Mr. President, these reservations that relate to the treaty do nothing more than Americanize this treaty for us. They do nothing more than preserve the liberties and the independence of the American people.

Last November the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] made much of the fact that the reservations then made a part of the resolution of ratification could not have been adopted without the votes of the "bitter-enders"—the enemies of the treaty. I call his attention now to the fact that every one of these reservations except the last has been adopted not only by a large majority of the Senate but they have received the support of a majority of the Senators who in some form or other have voted for ratification. These reservations, therefore, represent not only the views of a majority of the Senate but a majority of the friends of the treaty; and while last November the Senator from Nebraska taunted Senators upon this side with being in combination with the "bitter-enders," the Senator from Nebraska himself to-day has an open combination with those same "bitter-enders" that he so bitterly derided last November, and he knows that without that combination of the "bitter-enders" this treaty would be ratified to-day with the reservations adopted by a majority of the friends of the treaty in this Chamber.

The President says he wants a solemn referendum. We are willing. Why not vote to ratify this treaty with these reservations and then let us go before the country and settle the question of whether the American people approve these reservations or desire to accept the treaty unconditionally? If President Wilson is right in his belief that he is supported by the American people in his position, the next Congress can assume every one of these obligations which we decline to assume now. Why keep the United States in a continued state of war with Germany when we can terminate that war now with these reservations attached to the treaty? The other nations are eager to have the treaty ratified with these reservations. Who proposes to "break the heart of the world" to-day?

Mr. President, if I were considering political advantage I would welcome the rejection of the treaty to-day by those who are supporting President Wilson. If you on the other side insist upon taking the question into the campaign you insure an overwhelming Republican victory. But, Mr. President, from the standpoint of the welfare of the country, we ought not to continue in a state of war, technical though it be, for another year. We should resume commercial relations with Germany as quickly as Great Britain and France do. The present condition is not healthful. We can not resume a normal national life so long as we are in a state of war. To continue it because of the stubbornness of President Wilson is indefensible, and any Senator who follows him upon that question will, in my judgment, meet with the condemnation of the American people.

You need not reject the treaty to have a solemn referendum, if you insist upon that. Let the people decide whether they favor these reservations. If they do not, but are in accord with President Wilson, you will have the opportunity of securing victory in the campaign. Whether you do or do not, every Senator voting against the treaty because of their adoption must render an account to the people of the United States. We will meet you as Americans. You must meet us as internationalists. We will meet you as being for America first. You must meet us as advocates of the surrender of Americanism.

I hope there will be a sufficient number of votes to-day to ratify this treaty with these reservations. But whether there are or not, we declare by these reservations that the sacrifices for our liberties, from Bunker Hill down through the years to the battle fields of France, where lie thousands of our boys, shall not have been made in vain.

These reservations free us from obligations which are contrary to American principles and the spirit of our institutions, and through all the years to come the people of the United States will thank God for the American Senate that protected their liberties against those who would sacrifice their independence upon the altar of internationalism.

Following is the resolution of ratification:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, subject to the following reservations and understandings, which are hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted as a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by the allied and associated powers, and a failure on the part of the allied and associated powers to make objection to said reservations and understandings prior to the deposit of ratification by the United States shall be taken as a full and final acceptance of such reservations and understandings by said powers:

1. The United States so understands and construes article 1 that in case of notice of withdrawal from the League of Nations, as provided in said article, the United States shall be the sole judge as to whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under the said covenant have been fulfilled, and notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

2. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country by the employment of its military or naval forces, its resources, or any form of economic discrimination, or to interfere in any way in controversies between nations, including all controversies relating to territorial integrity or political independence, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States, under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall, in the exercise of full liberty of action, by act or joint resolution so provide.

3. No mandate shall be accepted by the United States under article 22, Part I, or any other provision of the treaty of peace with Germany, except by action of the Congress of the United States.

4. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children and in opium and other dangerous drugs, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the League of Nations, or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

5. The United States will not submit to arbitration or to inquiry by the assembly or by the council of the League Nations, provided for in said treaty of peace, any questions which in the judgment of the United States depend upon or relate to its long-established policy, commonly known as the Monroe doctrine; said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said League of Nations and entirely unaffected by any provision contained in the said treaty of peace with Germany.

6. The United States withholds its assent to articles 156, 157, and 158, and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy which may arise under said articles.

7. No person is or shall be authorized to represent the United States, nor shall any citizen of the United States be eligible, as a member of any body or agency established or authorized by said treaty of peace with Germany, except pursuant to an act of the Congress of the United States providing for his appointment and defining his powers and duties.

8. The United States understands that the reparation commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States, only when the United States by act or joint resolution of Congress approves such regulation or interference.

9. The United States shall not be obligated to contribute to any expenses of the League of Nations, or of the secretariat, or of any commission, or committee, or conference, or other agency, organized under the League of Nations or under the treaty or for the purpose of carrying out the treaty provisions, unless and until an appropriation of funds available for such expenses shall have been made by the Congress of the United States: Provided, That the foregoing limitation shall not apply to the United States proportionate share of the expense of the office force and salary of the secretary general.

10. No plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the council of the League of Nations under the provisions of article 8 shall be held as binding the United States until the same shall have been accepted by Congress, and the United States reserves the right to increase its armament without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

11. The United States reserves the right to permit, in its discretion, the nationals of a covenant-breaking State, as defined in article 16 of the covenant of the League of Nations, residing within the United States or in countries other than such covenant-breaking State, to continue their commercial, financial, and personal relations with the nationals of the United States.

12. Nothing in articles 296, 297, or in any of the annexes thereto, or in any other article, section, or annex of the treaty of peace with Germany shall, as against citizens of the United States, be taken to mean any confirmation, ratification, or approval of any act otherwise illegal or in contravention of the rights of citizens of the United States.

13. The United States withholds its assent to Part XIII (arts. 387 to 427, inclusive) unless Congress by act or joint resolution shall hereafter make provision for representation in the organization established by said Part XIII, and in such event the participation of the United States will be governed and conditioned by the provisions of such act or joint resolution.

14. Until part 1, being the covenant of the League of Nations, shall be so amended as to provide that the United States shall be entitled to cast a number of votes equal to that which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire in the aggregate shall be entitled to cast, the United States assumes no obligation to be bound, except in cases where Congress has previously given its consent, by any election, decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire in the aggregate have cast more than one vote.

The United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly arising out of any dispute between the United States and any member of the league if such member, or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire united with it politically has voted.

15. In consenting to the ratification of the treaty with Germany the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination and to the resolution of sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice adopted by the Senate June 6, 1919, and declares that when such government is attained by Ireland, a consummation it is hoped is at hand, it should promptly be admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the other day I took the time to reduce to writing a few thoughts bearing upon the subject of the ratification of this treaty. They were dictated before the adoption of reservation No. 15.

I am not quite clear in my own mind as to what the final result of the adoption of this reservation will be when it comes to the ultimate exchange of the ratifications. I voted against that reservation, not because of my wanting in sympathy with Irish aspirations, for I have looked forward to the time when the Irish might realize their national hopes. But as in part controlling my vote on this subject I had this thought uppermost in my mind: When we adopted reservation No. 4 we sought to guard very jealously our domestic rights and privileges, and it seems to me that it is hardly consonant with propriety for us in a great instrument of this kind to insist upon one rule of action for ourselves and adopt an entirely different rule when it applies to our allies in the Great War through which we have just struggled to a conclusion.

We can hardly say that the domestic affairs of this country are ours to look after to the exclusion of all other nations and at the same time insist upon taking a hand in the domestic affairs of Great Britain.

If it be a matter of political advantage, which some Senators had in mind when they voted upon this subject, whether they are Democrats or Republicans, let me remind them that the people of America are almost uncanny in their ability to weigh a situation and separate facts from fiction. The American people have ears and they can hear; they have eyes and they can see; they have an understanding and they will understand.

Mr. President, I have been the subject of conflicting emotions in the last few days. I have been hoping against hope, almost, for the ratification of this treaty. I still hope we shall succeed in ratifying it; but if we do not the responsibility will be equally divided between those who have been irreconcilably against the treaty from the beginning and those who have pretended to be its friends. Let us not mistake that situation. The conclusion has not yet been reached, but when it is reached experts in the Bertillon system will examine the thumb prints and they will be able to determine the responsibility. Strange, is it not, that those who want no treaty and those who insist on unconditional ratification should join hands in an enterprise which threatens to destroy the treaty—"the hope of the world"?

The treaty of peace with Germany was presented to the Senate on the 10th day of July, 1919, and was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It was reported back to the Senate on the 10th day of September, 1919. For several months prior to its presentation to the Senate it was the subject of much consideration and debate, and has been constantly before the Senate and the public ever since. Whatever differences of opinion exist among us, I think all must agree that the treaty should be disposed of without further delay.

I have been one of those who early in the consideration of the treaty came to the conclusion that it would be best to ratify it without amendment and without reservations. I say this not because I approve all of its provisions, and particularly of the covenants for a League of Nations, but because I keep in mind the treaty in relation to the spirit of unrest which prevails throughout the world, and particularly in Europe.

We entered and fought the war to save the world from military autocracy; and my belief has been and now is that we should make peace in such a way as to save the world from military autocracy.

Selfishness did not control us in declaring or waging war. Selfishness ought not to control us in making peace.

If unselfishness was a virtue in making and declaring war, it ought not to be a vice in making peace.

It must be borne in mind that the covenants for a League of Nations are not permanent in character. They are only temporary. We can ratify the treaty and within two years, by serving notice of our intention so to do, withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of the withdrawal.

The success of the league is going to depend largely upon whether the United States is a member or not. The world knows this; and if amendments are desired, the United States will always be in a position to demand them, and if they are not granted, to diplomatically withdraw.

My belief has been and is that as a member of the family of nations in this world crisis, we should not hesitate to join hands with the associated powers in preserving the world's equilibrium until normal conditions should resume their sway. We were not slackers in time of war, and we must not be slackers in time of peace.

Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, have already ratified the treaty, and have resumed their international relations with Germany. Of all the great powers associated with the World War, the United States alone is, legally speaking, still in a state of war with Germany. Until the treaty is ratified German trade is forbidden to our nationals, while their competitors are enjoying the usufruct of peace with Germany.

Why should be not adjust our differences of opinion as to the form of ratification of the treaty and thereby do our bit toward the restoration of peace in the world and the stabilization of political, social, and industrial conditions?

To my way of thinking the question before each Senator who believes in ratification is not what he thinks should be done, but what can be done so as to secure the approval of the necessary constitutional two-thirds of the Senators.

It is perfectly clear to me that those who believe in ratification ought not to be so tenacious of their personal opinions as to be unwilling to make concessions sufficient to secure ratification. If each one of us is to insist arbitrarily upon maintaining the supremacy of his own individual views, there never can be ratification, and there never can be peace with Germany.

Compromise is nothing new in either the ratification of treaties or in the enactment of legislation, and if the treaty is thus ratified I can not believe that the President will not submit it to the other signatory powers with the urgent request that it be accepted.

The President has a very solemn duty to perform, but the duty of the Senators is no less solemn; and as there should be concessions among Senators who believe in ratification, so I believe that as between the President and the Senate there should be similar concessions. The fathers of the country, in my humble judgment, so intended, otherwise they would not have provided by the Constitution that the President's power to make treaties should be "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The Constitution does not say that the Senate shall approve treaties which the President may make. It is as free to act in giving its advice and consent as the President is to negotiate; and it is just as important that the Senate shall give its advice and consent as it is that the President shall negotiate the treaty. The action of both is necessary to give vitality to the treaty. One can not do it without the concurrence of the other.

I want it to be clearly understood that in my own judgment it would be the best policy to ratify this treaty as it came to the Senate; and because it is perfectly clear to my own mind that this can not be done, the duty of the hour requires that we shall ratify it upon the best terms possible, and I appeal not only to Senators but to the President and the Senators to adjust their differences in the interests of world peace and stability.

If we were assured in advance by the foreign powers that the reservations which we may adopt would not be accepted, then there might be some excuse for our refusing to proceed to final action on the treaty; but it is perfectly clear to my mind that while our associated powers may feel disappointed that we do not unconditionally ratify this treaty, as they have done, they would much prefer that we ratify the treaty with these reservations than not to ratify it at all.

The public prints of the last few months have indicated that France would accept any reservations which the Senate of the United States might see fit to incorporate in the resolution of ratification; and Lord Grey, speaking, it is true, as an individual, in his letter to the London Times, written under date of January 31, 1920, said:

> If the outcome of the long controversy in the Senate will be to offer cooperation in the League of Nations, it would be the greatest mistake to refuse that cooperation because of the conditions attached to it.

And added:

> When that cooperation is accepted let it not be accepted in a spirit of pessimism.

The public prints indicate that while this letter was written as an expression of his personal views it had the substantial approval of the British authorities; at least, that is my understanding.

Do not Senators, therefore, have sound reason for believing that if the substance of the reservations which have already been approved by the Senate—and those which probably will be approved and incorporated in the resolution of ratification—will, if submitted to our associated powers, be accepted, even though they are disappointed that the ratification has not been unconditional and unqualified?

Do not Senators think that under these conditions we should proceed with the ratification, return the treaty to the President with the resolution of ratification which we shall adopt, if we adopt one, so that he may submit it to our allies for their action? If they accept it, the United States ought not to complain, and if they do not accept it we shall know authoritatively their views, and we can then take such further action as the circumstances may justify.

If it were possible to secure promptly unconditional ratification, then I would mark out a different course from that which I have made up my mind to pursue.

But that is wholly out of the question. Unconditional ratification can not be brought about. The treaty can be defeated either by those who insist upon unconditional ratification or by those who are irreconcilably against any League of Nations or by the joint action of the two. I very respectfully decline to follow the leadership of either, and thereby lend my help to a continuance of a state of war. Those who take the one position or the other can not escape their responsibility in part for a continuance of world unrest.

And where will their position lead us? To this: France and Great Britain, as I have indicated, show a disposition to accept ratification with the substance of such reservations as are now before the Senate. If the Senate thus ratifies this treaty and the President should refuse to exchange ratifications, it will put this country in the attitude of insisting upon giving to our associated powers more than they have indicated they are willing to accept.

Can this course be defended? Can any Senator go before the people and say to them: "I thought we should assume greater responsibilities than we do under the resolution of ratification. And though I have reason to believe that our associated powers would accept the ratification of the treaty with the reservations adopted, I insist that we shall not assume any responsibilities unless I can give to them more than they are ready to accept. And this is my position, notwithstanding the fact that it will continue the present state of war and the frightful spirit of unrest which pervades the entire civilization of the world"?

No, Senators, that course can not be defended.

Mr. KING. Will it interrupt the Senator if I ask a question at this point?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I want to invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that a league of nations, if one is established, is needed now more than ever before, and will be needed now more than it will be needed perhaps in several years from now.

Mr. POMERENE. I thank the Senator for the suggestion. It is my judgment that if the treaty had been promptly ratified it would have helped to quiet world conditions, and if we are going to leave it an open question for months in the future it will add fuel to the flames.

Mr. KING. Let me suggest to the Senator that whatever step is necessary now to bring peace to a distracted world and to bring order out of chaos in Europe can be taken under the treaty, even with the reservation to article 10, just the same as if article 10 were there unabridged or unqualified or without any reservation.

Mr. POMERENE. Undoubtedly so. I expect to discuss that question a little later on.

Much has been said about the nullification of the treaty. If we are to give to this word the significance which usually accompanies it in the history of the United States, it can hardly be said to be either a happy or appropriate term to apply to the reservations adopted by the Senate.

To "nullify," as I understand it, means "to render of no legal effect that which has already been adopted by some other legal authority." Has the league been adopted, so far as the United States is concerned? Is it therefore nullification to modify that which is not yet adopted? In the history of the United States—I quote from the Century Dictionary—to nullify means, "The action of a State, intended to abrogate within its limits the operation of a Federal law, under the assumption of absolute State sovereignty." Or, to express the same thought in another form—and again I quote from the Century Dictionary—"The doctrine of nullification, the doctrine that the power of a State to nullify acts of Congress is an integral feature of American constitutional law and not revolutionary, was elaborated by John C. Calhoun and applied by South Carolina in 1832." Benton says, "Nullification is 'the assumed right of a State to annul an act of Congress.'"

Surely the German treaty negotiated by the President can have no legal effect until it receives the advice and consent of the Senate and there has been an exchange of ratifications.

The Senate is wholly within its constitutional rights when it seeks to adopt reservations. It is not thereby nullifying the treaty, because there is no treaty. It is exercising its constitutional function; and in so doing its action can not be criticized except from the standpoint of policy.

We might just as well say that the United States Senate nullifies a law because it refuses to concur in a bill which has passed the House of Representatives as to say that the Senate nullifies a treaty which has been negotiated by the President simply because it refuses to concur fully therein.

Most of the discussion, both in and out of the Senate, has centered around article 10. Personally I would much prefer that it remain intact. It is urged with very great vehemence that if the Senate accepts it without reservation, and later the Congress of the United States, when called upon, would refuse to furnish its Army and Navy, it would be guilty of bad faith.

On a former date I discussed this subject, and I do not intend now to enter upon it again further than to say I can not accept this conclusion. The signatory powers, when they negotiated this treaty and ratified it, fully understood that they were dealing with a nation whose sovereign powers were divided among different agencies, and the powers of each agency were limited. They knew that our treaty-making power was vested in the President and the Senate and that our war-making power was vested in the Congress of the United States. They knew full well that a contingency might arise whereby a future Congress might refuse to carry out the obligations entered upon by the treaty-making power. It might result in a breach of contract, but certainly it could not be a breach of faith if the Congress refused to respond.

Of course, I do not want our country to be put in such an attitude; I want it at all times to be beyond suspicion. And certainly there can be no objection, if my position is right—and I think it is—to say in the reservations in substance, "It is understood that the execution of the obligation contained in article 10 is always within the jurisdiction of the Congress."

I shall not pause to point out the line of discrimination which may or may not exist between the first and the second so-called Lodge reservations, or between them and the Hitchcock reservation, or between the Lodge reservation and the Simmons reservation, or between any one of them and the reservation drafted by the bipartisan committee. I say this because I would vote to ratify this treaty under present conditions either with or without article 10.

I wish to say to my friend the distinguished and able Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] that if he can vote for the treaty with his own reservation adopted, I do not see how he can refuse to vote for it with the Lodge reservation in it. In the administration of this subject by the League of Nations, I submit to all fair-minded men that they can not point out a real distinction between the two reservations.

But let us assume for the sake of the argument that some reservaton is adopted which eliminates entirely article 10. I can not consent to the assertion that it takes the heart out of the treaty. Even if the United States should refuse to accept in whole or in part the provisions of article 10 the covenants for the League of Nations as they have been ratified by our associated powers unconditionally, and by the United States with such reservations as may be adopted, they will constitute the greatest peace treaty ever devised by the nations of the world. Let me enumerate some of the results which will be accomplished:

First. The league will be an established fact, even if the United States should only be considered an advisory member under the Lodge reservations, which may be adopted.

Second. Under article 11, any war or threat of war, whether affecting any of the members of the league or not, is declared to be a matter of concern to the whole league; and the league can "take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations." This will be true whether the ratification of the treaty by the United States is unconditional or with article 10 eliminated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator uses the words "with article 10 eliminated." I invite his attention to the fact that the reservation to article 10 does not propose to eliminate, but leaves unimpaired the great obligation, moral and legal, to respect the territorial integrity and political independence of every signatory of the league.

Mr. POMERENE. In substance the Senator is right, but I am basing my argument on the assumption of the entire elimination of article 10 in order that I may better show the virtue and the efficiency of the other provisions in the covenants for the league.

Third. Any member of the league will have the "friendly right * * * to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends." Such concerted action in the cause of peace will have a restraining effect if nothing more.

Fourth. The members agree to submit to arbitration all disputes which the parties thereto recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration and which they can not satisfactorily settle by diplomacy.

Among these disputes generally regarded as suitable for submission to arbitration are (a) disputes as to the interpretation of a treaty; (b) disputes as to any question of international law; (c) disputes concerning any fact which if established would constitute a breach of any international obligation; (d) disputes as to the extent and nature of reparation to be made for such breach. The members agree to carry out in full good faith any award that may be rendered, and that they will not go to war against any member of the League which complies therewith.

Fifth. All other disputes which are likely to lead to a rupture, and which are not submitted to arbitration, they agree to submit to investigation and report.

If a settlement is effected, "a statement shall be made public giving such facts and explanations regarding the dispute and the terms of settlement thereof as the council may deem appropriate."

If it is not settled, the council, either unanimously or by a majority, may make and publish a report containing a statement of the facts of the dispute and the recommendations which are regarded just and proper. If their report is not unanimous, the members of the league reserve to themselves the right to take such action as they consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice. If it is unanimous, the members agree not to go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendation of the report.

Sixth. All hostilities are suspended pending the arbitration or inquiry and for a period of three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report of the council.

Seventh. Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of the covenants under articles 12, 13, or 15, it shall be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league, and they agree to subject it to a severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, as well as the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State.

Eighth. They agree that they will mutually support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken under article 16, in order to minimize the loss and inconvenience resulting from the adoption of the measures just described.

Ninth. A plan for international disarmament is provided.

Tenth. The cause of peace is given all of the advantages which are to be derived from the public discussion of international controversies and the suspension of hostilities during investigation, thereby giving the blood time to cool and reason the opportunity to resume its sway.

Eleventh. That pregnant source of war, the secret treaty, is abolished.

These are some, and perhaps the most important, advantages to be gained by the league and the treaty. They are a long step in advance of any method of settlement of international disputes heretofore devised.

With these provisions in the treaty, how can it be seriously urged that the heart is taken out of the treaty if the substance of article 10 is not approved by the Senate?

Are they not all vital forces looking toward the protection of the "territorial integrity and existing political independence" of all the signatory powers against external aggression?

Can any Senator justify himself in voting to reject the treaty which contains so many provisions looking to the preservation of international peace because he can not get all he wants?

Shall we, by rejecting the treaty, thereby continue a state of war because we are not doing as much in the interests of the peace of the whole world as we think we ought to do?

If that be our position, how can we escape our share of responsibility for continuing the present state of unrest in the world?

We might as well say to the starving man, "We will not give you a half loaf because you need a whole loaf." As well might we say to the physician, "You shall not go to the relief of the man who is bleeding to death because you do not have all the appliances you think you need," as to say to the stricken world, "We shall not give you the benefit of any of this treaty because we can not give it all to you."

The duty of the hour requires that we do all we can.

My soul rebels at the thought that "I shall do nothing because I can not do all that I feel I ought to do."

Now is the accepted time for action. Already the ratification of this treaty has been too long delayed, and those who may be responsible for further undue delay will be held to strict accountability before the bar of public opinion.

Eighty-two Senators out of 96 have indicated by their votes here in the Senate that they believe this treaty should be ratified. To them the people of the country and of the world are looking for an adjustment of their differences of opinion, to the end that the peace of the world may be restored. Shall we disappoint them? Or does it not rather devolve upon us to ratify the treaty and bring to a realization, so far as we can, the hopes and the prayers of a war-weary world?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have been giving much thought to the rather confusing events of yesterday, and have reached the conclusion that, perhaps, after all, the adoption of the Irish reservation was the only possible way, in view of the situation, in which the treaty could be ratified.

Friends of the League of Nations have nothing to lose and all to gain by at least submitting it to the powers. Unless they vote for the treaty, the desire for ratification of those who were supposed to be its greatest friends is not as strong as the desire to "play politics." When the issue of the Irish vote appeared, then the real friends of the treaty were discovered.

It is not surprising that the irreconcilables smilingly favored the Irish reservation, as they recognized that that was the surest way to "ditch" it forever. However, perhaps I am wrong—and I hope that I am—in my interpretation that the passing of the Irish reservation was simply a political bluff, and that those who have insisted through so many weary months that they wanted to ratify the treaty are going to vote to-day to do so and show the real sincerity of their interest in the future of the Irish. Certainly, the Irish will not be much impressed with the spectacle of Senators one day adopting a reservation and the same Senators the next day refusing to vote for it when it really means something. In other words, for the reservation to be effective this treaty must be ratified, and then our representative in the League of Nations, with the power and force of the United States back of him, takes part in the council of the League of Nations, committed to Irish independence.

Therefore the vote to-day will demonstrate to the world whether the Irish vote yesterday was sincere or otherwise. I voted against the Irish reservation yesterday because I was a sincere friend of the effort to try to prepare a way for the United States to be a part of the concord of nations, and I feared its adoption would make the treaty that much more difficult of acceptance by nations abroad; but now that it is a part of the reservations I am going cheerfully to vote for it, and that is the vote that means something. I voted against it not because I did not have full sympathy for the people of Ireland in their struggle but because the reservation as worded gave a wrong impression of America's policy. However, I have endeavored to meet the different phases of this weary controversy in a spirit of compromise, and in that same spirit I gladly accept this reservation and hope that the treaty will be ratified, so that among other benefits it can be of material help to the Irish people.

Either you gentlemen on the other side who have been working for ratification meant your vote yesterday or you did not. If you meant it you will finish it to-day and not "scrap" the treaty. Certainly you do not want it to be said that your vote yesterday was in the nature of an Indian gift or that you were "handing a lemon" to the Irish people. Otherwise to-day you will cast a vote that counts and thus finally put it up to the powers across the sea. Yesterday's action is useless if not officially ratified.

I congratulate the irreconcilables on both sides for their clever alliances. The Republicans last evening were strongly criticized by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] for playing with them and being in partnership with them in adopting various reservations that he believed would kill the treaty. Without Democratic help an alliance with the "irreconcilables" was the only way we could get the treaty Americanized. On the other hand, are we to assume that the Democrats on the other side who voted for this most important Irish reservation were in partnership with the "irreconcilables" to kill the treaty, or are they going to follow their vote of yesterday by an affirmative vote to-day? That is the only way they can demonstrate their sincerity. If they are sincere the adding of this reservation will assure the ratification of the treaty, as the same votes on the other side will be more than sufficient for that purpose. In fact, I have noted that several of the Democrats who voted for the Irish reservation have never voted for any other reservation. Therefore it must be assumed that that means their approval. I do not think that the Irish will be satisfied by a mere expression of sentiment by the United States Senate on one day which is reconsidered the next. If all they wanted was an expression, that the Senate gave unanimously last June. The Irish have been fed up on camouflage and political expediency on the part of their supposed friends for many, many years. I thoroughly realize that the Irish have opposed the treaty, but now the condition has changed. Why should not every Irishman welcome into the League of Nations the United States, with all its power and influence, to represent their ambitions? If we do not ratify the treaty Ireland will not have the benefit of our voice and power in the league.

Mr. President, I have endeavored through these many months to assume and to maintain a consistent attitude. I feel that I have done so. I admire very much the speech just delivered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. As the various amendments have been suggested I have voted against every one of them, but have voted for all reservations which I thought were necessary to Americanize the treaty and positively to protect the independence and sovereignty of our own country. I voted against amendments because it is my conviction that we, as Senators of the United States, are not particularly concerned as to what shall govern other nations; our responsibility is what will govern us. When we amend the treaty we change it textually, and, of course, such a change applies to all nations; but when we ratify the treaty, stating that we do so under certain conditions and understandings, while we ought not refuse other nations an opportunity to do likewise, we are simply protecting our own position so that the world can not misunderstand us. That is the reason why I have voted against all amendments and have voted for most of the reservations.

I am positive that America, which evaded no responsibility during the war, will evade none in times of peace. League of Nations or no League of Nations, America will do her full duty at any time that any questions arise, internationally or otherwise, which require action on her part. I have, however, always been a firm believer in the results possible through what might be termed "round-table conferences," and with our country's independence as thoroughly protected as we feel confident it has been I believe that the United States owes it to the world to take part in those round-table conferences and to use her influence, her force, and her power in order to try to help solve the questions that are now engaging the attention of the entire world. If we look at the subject simply from a selfish standpoint, we can not continue the prosperity to which we have been accustomed by doing business alone with ourselves. I am not an internationalist in the sense that that term is usually understood, but I hope that I am not so extremely narrow as to entertain the view that this country should not do business with all the countries of the world, hold intercourse and carry on commerce with them, and be of every possible benefit we can be to all the nations of the world.

Therefore, properly protected, we should take our position at the table and help consider all big questions. I feel that this great country, with its power and its force and its wealth, can contribute greatly to help solve these great problems. Therefore I shall be very much disappointed if those on the other side are not prepared at this critical moment by their votes to permit the trial to be made.

The treaty has been Americanized. Our interests have been amply protected. They need our advice and our power and our force. We owe the world something from a selfish standpoint, again may I repeat. We want their alliance along many lines of industry. We have all to lose if we view it that way—you Senators particularly on the other side—and nothing to gain by defeating the treaty to-day. We have no information from abroad that would lead us to believe, so far as I have been informed, that they would not accept the treaty as we have surrounded it with reservations. Then why should we assume that they will not do it? Why assume that they are going to object to our Americanizing the treaty and protecting our own interests? We do not deny them the same privilege. I can not analyze the mind of a Senator who truly and squarely is for the adoption and ratification of this treaty who under present conditions and understandings is not willing at least to test it out. Without the Americanizing reservations, without the positive protection, no; but with them, what can possibly be the answer? As the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] very properly said, We have one responsibility; the President has another. Our responsibility is to use our own judgment, and his responsibility is, of course, to use his.

I do not question, I do not know—I will not say I do not care, because I do—what he may do, but I do say and reiterate and emphasize that if Senators on the other side really believe that we owe this cooperation to humanity—and properly protected, I believe we do—then I can not understand how they can vote against the treaty to-day. Certainly they do not object to America protecting itself, especially if nations abroad do not. Let us dispose of this question that has taken so many weary hours of our time that should have been devoted to other responsibilities. Let us ratify the treaty, and let England and France say we are selfish if they want to, rather than our deciding it ourselves; and let us clear the decks here, so that we can assume the responsibilities for which we were elected and try to solve some of the pressing domestic problems the uncertainty of which is holding back every type of home development.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, it is not an uncommon thing for legislators to be confronted with the necessity of determining which of two alternatives they ought to accept, both of them being in a high degree distasteful. Such is the embarrassing predicament in which Democratic Senators now find themselves. They may vote to reject the treaty, at least for the present, or they may vote to ratify it with reservations that emasculate, if they do not destroy, features of the covenant that, in their judgment, are in no small degree essential to insure its successful operation as a means of averting war. They may join with the implacable foes of the treaty or they may unite with its fair-weather friends, determined to end the contest, so far as the Senate is concerned, taking the best that, in the unfortunate situation confronting them, can be secured.

The situation should not be mistaken. The treaty has had no ardent support on the Republican side of the Chamber. Friends there are there who approve the general plan of the covenant; a few of them, woefully few, might vote for it, if driven to the choice of voting for it as it came to the Senate, or rejecting it, but most of them have been cautiously restrained in their commendation of the instrument and profuse in their criticism of features they believed ought to be modified. Others who, upon one consideration or another, gave reluctant assent to the project for a league and voted for the resolution of ratification embracing the so-called Lodge reservations, have been hypercritical in their attitude toward it, if not openly denunciatory. No one who heard and no one who reads the speech of the senior Senator from Massachusetts of August 12, 1919, can regard it as having been uttered with any purpose except to discredit the whole idea of a League of Nations and bring about the rejection of the treaty because of the covenant. The impassioned remarks with which he closed the debate last night clearly revealed that he does not now regard it with any higher degree of favor. A third class, constituting a considerable and influential minority, able and respected Senators, as is well known, have been unceasing and unyielding in their opposition to the whole plan of preserving peace by concerted action of the nations, as contemplated in the covenant. They were represented, out of all proportion to their numbers, on the Committee on Foreign Relations which reported the Lodge reservations, none of which would have been or could have been adopted by the committee without the votes of the members of the "bitter-end" class.

Probably none of them will deny that they entertained the confident hope that the Democratic Members would vote with them to reject the treaty so qualified, and that thus the odium of its defeat would be cast upon the party of which the President who negotiated it is the leader. How far that hope was shared by those who heretofore voted for the resolution of ratification qualified by the Lodge reservations must remain a matter of speculation, but the circumstances attending the breaking up of the sessions of the bipartisan conference committee and the obduracy exhibited in the face of efforts to change even the form of some of the reservations, though the substance was in no wise affected, lead to the conclusion that such joy on the Republican side of the Chamber as would attend the success of a resolution of ratification would be, generally speaking, over a supposed party victory rather than over the advancement of the cause of world peace through the retransmission of the treaty to the President. I am confirmed in this belief by the fact that not the slightest disposition has been exhibited so to frame the resolutions in mere matter of form as to make them less objectionable to the President. He has been bitterly assailed, and I am not saying that some of the criticism was not without justice, for insisting, as it has been expressed, on the ratification of the treaty without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t"; and yet the very Senators who have been unrestrained in their criticism of him for his alleged obstinacy in that regard have been at least as obdurate in insisting that the so-called Lodge reservations must stand unaltered even as to the matters of form. Again and again they have taunted the great majority of Democratic Senators with servility, intellectually and morally, because they have concurred in their views, or have accommodated them to those of the President, the leader of their party, in whose acumen and wisdom they have had abundant cause to confide, and yet it is notorious that on their side of the Chamber are no inconsiderable number who upon one consideration or another have voted with unfailing regularity upon matters connected with the treaty as their party leader, the senior Senator from Massachusetts, has directed, or in some manner indicated he desired they should.

Notwithstanding the considerations to which I have adverted, I have no hesitancy whatever in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion as to the course I ought to take on the resolution of ratification now before us. I shall vote for it, because, after every reasonable effort, the resolution, qualified as it is, is the best that can be secured. I regret exceedingly that if we are to participate in the effort to preserve the peace of the world on the new plan as members of the League of Nations, it should be weakened in important features as is proposed, but as we are compelled to take what is offered or to take nothing, I am prepared to accept what can be had, and to trust to the future to strengthen the system by amendment should such a course seem necessary or advisable.

I am constrained to take the course indicated, because I am unable to find any good ground to hope that we shall at any time in the future be able to secure the necessary two-thirds vote in the Senate for ratification without reservations substantially like those now adopted by the Senate. Some there are who counsel going to the country on the issue. But on what issue can the judgment of the sovereign people be taken? The Republican Party will undoubtedly declare in the platform adopted at its national convention in favor of ratification with the Lodge reservations. The irreconcilable Senators and their partisans throughout the country will struggle in that convention for the adoption of the policy of rejection, but they will go down before the general demand for ratification. One of the ablest among them, the distinguished senior Senator from Idaho, who declares his purpose of raising the issue of total rejection in some manner, whatever may be the action of the Republican convention, asserted on the floor of the Senate that its attitude is certainly foreshadowed in the resolutions of the convention of the State of New York declaring for ratification with the Lodge reservations. The Democratic convention, on the other hand, will declare in favor of ratification without reservations or with interpretative reservations such as those offered by the senior Senator from Nebraska. The issue will accordingly be, not whether the treaty shall be ratified or rejected but whether it will be ratified without reservations or with interpretative reservations only, or be ratified with the Lodge reservations.

I venture no prediction upon the result of such a test before the American people. If the Republicans win, the situation is not improved. But suppose the Democrats win? Suppose the party to which I belong, in whose success I am most deeply concerned, in whose achievements in peace and in war under the leadership of President Wilson I take profound pride, should prevail at the ensuing election, regain control of the Senate, and elect the President; how, then, would the situation be changed? The best we can hope to do, so far as the Senate is concerned, is to make a net gain of five seats. The lessons of history forbid that we expect any results more favorable, so that we can not honestly entertain the belief that we shall have more than 52 Senators on the Democratic side when the new Congress assembles after March 4, 1921. One of these will certainly vote against ratification and as many as three may. It will be impossible to muster more than 50 votes on the Democratic side of the Chamber, so that it will be necessary to go across the aisle for at least 14 votes. Sixteen would be a safer estimate. We shall be obliged to make compromises in order to get any such number. The Members on that side who could be induced to vote for ratification without reservations may be counted on the fingers of one hand, if, indeed, there are any such.

It may be argued that should the Democratic Party be successful in the coming campaign the result of the election will or may be regarded by Republican Senators as the verdict of the country, and as in the nature of an instruction to vote for ratification without reservations, which they could not ignore. But such a hope is vain. The newly elected Republican Members will feel pledged by the platform on which they ran to vote against ratification except the resolution is qualified by the Lodge reservations, and the hold-over Members will be confirmed in their attitude by the platform declaration.

Moreover, it is rare that the result of any national election can be regarded as an unequivocal indorsement of any particular issue, even though it be in some quarters regarded as the paramount issue. It is evident that Republican political managers intend making a general assault on what they call Democratic extravagance and incompetency. Notwithstanding the magnificent record made by the Treasury in financing the war and the wonderful way in which the men and the resources of the country were marshaled for its successful prosecution, some people may be induced to take stock in such a fly-specking campaign who are quite favorably impressed with the covenant as it stands. Republics are proverbially ungrateful, and many people will forget that under the guidance and direction of a Democratic administration, as Ibanez expressed it, this Nation "created armies with a rapidity and put forth efforts never equaled in history."

The autocratic powers with which the President was invested by a Democratic Congress, rarely without Republican concurrence, for the more vigorous prosecution of the war, are made the object of much declamation, though the present Republican Congress has in no instance, though it has been operating almost continuously for a year, attempted vainly, because of his veto, or in any conspicuous instance attempted at all, to deprive him of such powers. Indeed, as to some of them which have been allowed to pass into a state of innocuous desuetude, a very considerable demand has recently been made that, by reason of distressing and unanticipated conditions, their exercise in all their fullness should in the public interest be resumed. And yet it is apparently confidently expected that votes will be marshaled against Democratic candidates because President Wilson has been given autocratic power.

On the other hand, the Democrats will insist that the Republican purpose is to restore, and that Republican success means the restoration, to power of the reactionary forces of the country unhorsed in 1912 through a revolt in the Republican Party, occasioned by bitter resistance within its ranks to the policies and practices of the then and now dominant faction therein. It is easily conceivable that many who give little thought to the treaty, or to the differences such as there may be between the parties with reference thereto, may vote for the Democratic candidates upon the issue last referred to or upon other issues. Some there are who insist that the "wet" or "dry" question will be an important one. It will be easy for a Republican Senator who is opposed to the treaty without reservations, such as the platform of his party commends, to convince himself that the result was not decisive as between ratification with the Lodge reservations, on the one hand, or ratification without reservations or with interpretative reservations on the other.

I did not observe that any Democratic Senator was influenced in his attitude on pending public questions by the result of the congressional election of 1918, or that it was by any such regarded as a repudiation by the country of any specific policy of the administration. Even in those countries in which, under their peculiar systems of government, the opinion of the country can be much more accurately taken upon specific issues, it is rare that members of the losing party in their legislative bodies conform to what is believed to be the verdict. They remain in opposition sometimes from settled conviction and a conscientious devotion to duty, sometimes because they desire to conform to the views of their constituents, even though they run counter to those announced by the country at large.

I repeat, it is vain to hope for ratification during even the next Congress, should anyone feel justified in deferring final action on the treaty for another year, unless substantial concessions are made in order to gain Republican votes to make up the necessary two-thirds of the Senate. Indeed, there is reason to fear that such a state of chaos will by that time prevail in Europe, should we so long defer action and decline to participate in the attempt to compose or decide the multitudinous differences that have arisen and that will arise out of the new order of affairs brought about by the war and the peace, in the solution of which our assistance is so imperative, that the total failure of the league plan, so confidently predicted by its enemies, is quite probable.

Nor is there any ground, in my opinion, for the belief, should anyone entertain it, that meanwhile the pressure of public opinion and the overwhelming demand for the restoration of a state of peace between this country and Germany and her allies will compel the requisite number of Republican Senators to yield in any important particular, much less to constrain them to vote for ratification without reservations or with reservations that are interpretative only. They will construe the growing demand as a call to the Democratic Members to accept the Lodge reservations, rather than to them to vote for unqualified ratification.

Like the orator of the Revolution, I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided, and that is the lamp of experience. I voted against the resolution of ratification embracing the Lodge reservations on November 19 in the belief, at least in the hope, that a sorely disappointed public would force opinionated and refractory Senators into some kind of a compromise. The sad story of the failure of every effort in that direction need not be retold. But it is not improper to note that no advances from the Democratic side of the Chamber for conferences with the friends of the treaty on the other side of the aisle got anywhere, except upon condition that the senior Senator from Massachusetts should approve and participate.

How the bipartisan conference was proceeding satisfactorily with its work, and how, laboring to effect a compromise on the reservation in relation to article 10, on which it had made some progress, it suspended operations to permit the Republican members to confer, and how, when the conference reassembled, it found itself unable to proceed, owing to the fact that the Senator from Massachusetts was in session with the Republican irreconcilables, following which the Senator announced as an ultimatum to the bipartisan conference that no change whatever could be made in the reservation then under consideration by it, is a story familiar to all who have followed the debates in the Senate. Apparently the so-called mild reservationists would not proceed without the concurrence of the Senator from Massachusetts, and the Senator from Massachusetts found himself obliged to conform to the counsel or advice of the irreconcilables. I know it has been stated upon the floor that the Democratic members had been advised before the conference committee met that the Republican members would not consent to any change whatever of substance in the reservation in relation to article 10. I had not been so advised and did not know that any such attitude was taken, and if the information had already been conveyed to the Democratic Senators, why did the Senator from Massachusetts deem it necessary to declare, following his conference with the Republican irreconcilable Senators, that no change whatever in article 10 would be tolerated, and why should deliberations touching that reservation and the efforts to accomplish a modification that would be mutually satisfactory, or at least acceptable, have been entered upon at all?

I regret to say that, so far as I was able to learn, the disappointment on the Republican side of the Chamber at the collapse of the effort through the bipartisan conference to compose the differences between the friends of the treaty was neither widespread nor poignant. No one conversant with the situation can help but be impressed with the view that such influence as public opinion exerted after the rejection of the various resolutions of ratification voted on in November operated to incline Democratic Members to accept, if necessary, the Lodge reservations rather than to induce Republican Members to yield in any degree with respect to the same. It is not strange that it should be so, since the Democratic Senators, as a rule, have shown themselves solicitous for the ratification of the treaty, profoundly desirous of it, while a powerful contingent on the Republican side is uncompromisingly hostile to it, an insignificant few sincerely friendly, and the remainder affected with varying degrees of indifference.

The increasingly critical situation of the country and the world consequent upon the delay in the ratification of the treaty since November 19, 1919, and the insistent demand for peace have mollified Democratic opposition to ratification of the treaty with the Lodge reservations instead of weakening the purpose of their supporters to maintain them. I am confident that a similar result would attend a further postponement.

A supporter of the principle of a League of Nations would not, of course, be justified in voting for the pending resolution of ratification believing that the reservations adopted by the Senate nullify the treaty or the covenant. No one seriously contends, I suppose, that they nullify the treaty, and I am unable to subscribe to the view that they nullify the covenant. No vital principle of the treaty is seriously affected by any of them except that embodied in article 10.

With all due respect to the opinions of those who may choose to believe that article 10, interpreted in the light of the Constitution, is not seriously affected by the reservation touching that feature of the covenant, I can not accept that view. In my judgment article 10 is destroyed, so far as the United States is in any sense whatever obligated by it, except in an unimportant particular, namely, in that our country obligates itself to respect the territorial integrity and political independence of all other members of the league. But the article has been eviscerated and its value destroyed, so far as the United States was by it made a factor in the preservation of the peace of the world. Article 10 is not eliminated from the covenant; we simply decline to assume its obligations. All other members do, save as those hereafter ratifying may, following our example and that of Switzerland, relieve themselves by reservations. The article in question is intact as between the great, powerful nations which have already ratified. They have all assumed all the perils it involves, so luridly pictured in the debate, obligating themselves to send their boys to the ends of the earth to engage in wars in which they have no direct interest, to use language which the debate has made familiar. That will help some toward deterring predatory wars, even though the United States does not assume a like obligation. They agree, it will be noted, to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of all members against external aggression—even the United States.

Senators have declaimed upon the imminent deadly peril in which we stand from Japan. Scarcely a week goes by but some one raises a scare about the acquisition by Japan of a naval base in Lower California or elsewhere along the western coast of Mexico, or about some mysterious mission from one of those countries to the other, implying some sinister designs to subjugate America. If Japan should at any time, with a fatuity that outdid the Kaiser's obsession, undertake the conquest of the United States, all other members of the league are bound to come to our aid—Great Britain, France, Spain, Italy, the Scandinavian countries—all must rally to our side. We do not need their help. There is no enemy on earth we need fear, but the Japanese jingoes may not think so; they might, under other conditions, be willing to attempt the impossible, but they will hesitate to try their prowess against us, protected as we are by article 10. No informed American has any occasion to dread the outcome of such a contest, from a military point of view, should it be precipitated. No American who loves his country can contemplate it except with horror.

A few days ago the Senator from Connecticut, in the course of a speech delivered in his inimitable style, inquired what the "royal American farmer" is thinking about the treaty, and whether he, the said "royal American farmer," is thinking of how, if the natives of India rose against the rule of Great Britain, and Russia were to go to their aid, he, the "royal American farmer," would have to send his boys to India to uphold British rule. I imagine not. If he reflects upon the subject at all, I dare say he reasons that if Russia should invade India on the occasion of a native uprising it will be because of a recrudescence of her ancient lust for territory, and that, in the event of her success, the Indians will simply exchange an English for a Russian master. And the more he reflects on the subject the more the "royal American farmer" will be certain to conclude that as under article 10 Russia must meet a world in arms, not, of course, including the United States, should she invade India, she probably will repress her land hunger and stay at home, where she is likely to have problems for some time, at least.

She would be confirmed in that purpose if the United States, too, were obligated to go in. If she should appear determined in her purpose to renew the Afghan war and again set the world ablaze, the council would sit to consider what ought to be done. Our member would confer with the representatives of the other States, all of whom, except the United States and possibly some of the lesser powers, equally reluctant to bear their fair share of the burden and protected by reservations, would be obligated to "go the limit." One would think the member from the United States would have some delicacy about offering any advice under the circumstances, just as it would be expected that the Senate of the United States, declining to assume any of the burden of article 10, would renounce any possible benefit from it. But the process through which we are going of Americanizing the treaty—God save the mark—so highly extolled by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], who has just addressed the Senate, would perhaps leave him no choice in the discharge of his duties, humiliating though it be.

But quite aside from the considerations heretofore canvassed, the covenant is not, in my judgment, a vain thing without article 10. Indeed, I am satisfied upon mature reflection that I myself originally attached to it undue importance. I believe it can be demonstrated that almost, if not quite all, that is or will be accomplished by article 10 is secured to the world by other provisions of the covenant. By article 12 each member agrees that in the event of any dispute with another likely to lead to a rupture it will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council. By article 15 it is provided that in case any dispute is not submitted to arbitration it will be referred to the council for investigation and report. If the report is not unanimous, the parties are at liberty to proceed to war, if either cares to take that course; if the report is unanimous, the members agree that they will not go to war with any member which complies with the recommendations of the report. Then by article 16 it is provided that should any member resort to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13, or 15, it shall not only be deemed to have committed an act of war against every other member, but each member is required to set up at once against it and its nationals a complete economic boycott. Every possible commercial and financial pressure is to be brought to bear from every quarter of the globe to constrain it to keep the peace or to render abortive its resort to arms.

Many advocates of a league of nations insist that the certainty of commercial isolation will alone coerce any first-class power into a peaceful settlement of any international dispute in which it may be involved, and that a provision for resort to arms in a covenant to preserve the peace of the world is wholly unnecessary. A league boycott against Great Britain would reduce her people to a state of starvation in a month.

Moreover, under both article 16 and article 11, the council immediately proceeds to consider the situation and to recommend to the powers what action ought to be taken in the premises. If it arrives at the conclusion that the terrible enginery of the world boycott will not be effective, or will be too dilatory, it may recommend war as a last resort against the nation which, by the solemn recital of the covenant, has raised its hand against all mankind and become an outlaw in the society of nations.

The troops of the nation assailed with those of any other coming to its aid and moving to counter against the common enemy would be entitled to free passage across the territory of any member, and each stands obligated by article 16 to come to the relief of any against which special measures may be directed by the covenant-breaking nation.

I find it impossible to conceive of a case under which the obligation imposed by article 10 would become active that would not be a violation of articles 12 and 15, entailing the penalties prescribed by article 16. Certainly no war of aggression directed against or threatening the territorial integrity or political independence of any member could be carried on consistently with the provisions of the articles referred to. Austria would have been in violation of article 15, had it then been operative as against her, by her invasion of Serbia. She would have been required by its terms to take her dispute with that country to Geneva and to refrain from making war, however just her cause, until a report should be made. If Serbia complied with an award against her, Austria would still be restrained from attacking her by all the consequences that would be visited upon her under article 16, should she, in that event, resort to war. It is perhaps conceivable, and yet hardly so, that a nation should make aggressive warfare without having any dispute such as is contemplated in articles 12 and 15, but no nation has ever so flouted the public opinion of the world as to wage an utterly causeless war of conquest without setting up some claim it pretended to assert or defend. Marauding savages sometimes do so, but nations, never.

Germany demanded of Belgium the right to cross the territory of the latter to reach France. The bold King of the Belgians declined and a dispute was thus precipitated between them. While, then, a nation contemplating offending against article 10 would not find a world obligated to take up arms against her, she would be confronted with the certainty that she would be commercially and financially isolated, pressed on all sides by the irresistible force which such a condition in the marvelous interdependence of nations in our time implies. But more, its course would bring the other nations of the earth at once together through their representatives in the council to consider what steps in addition to the boycott, which would automatically go into effect, should be taken to coerce the recalcitrant nation. If the council should recommend warlike measures the member nations would be under no obligation to comply, but the moral force of such a recommendation would be great. The risk which any nation would incur in making aggressive warfare would be immeasurably increased, the league being in operation even without article 10, and the likelihood that it would precipitate a conflict correspondingly remote.

I venture to assert that three-fourths, if not nine-tenths, of the virtue of article 10 is found in the other provisions of the covenant, a condition which makes it difficult to understand why anyone should, on the one hand, determine to wreck the treaty if article 10 stays in, or, on the other hand, to reject the treaty if it goes out.

I regret that article 10 does not remain in full vigor so far as we are concerned, chiefly because my pride as an American suffers at proposing to the other leagued nations that we become entitled to any benefits accruing under the system, but decline to assume our proportionate share of its burdens. At least, we ought to absolve the other nations from any obligation to us under article 10. Decency demands no less. Therein lies the chief objection harbored by Democratic Senators to the reservations adopted by the Senate, as a whole.

Scarcely without exception they propose that we enjoy some advantage not shared by the other members of the league or escape some obligations which they have assumed, each in its due proportion. I forbear to canvass the reservations severally at present to point out this characteristic. It was sufficiently disclosed in the long debate.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. Continuing the thought about the many things remaining in the treaty after the reservations have been concurred in, does not the Senator find items of great value with respect to reduction of armaments, with respect to secret treaties, and with respect to a world court of arbitration?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I intended to confine myself to those provisions which, in my judgment, compensate us for the destruction of article 10, but that there are other admirable provisions in the treaty tending to promote peace and to avert war is indisputable.

Much has been said about Americanizing the treaty. The expression will doubtless serve the purpose for which it was invented—to do service on the stump. If I enter into a contract with a number of gentlemen, including an agent of the Vice President who acts, subject to the approval of the latter, it is easy for him to "Marshallize" the contract by changing it so as to relieve himself from a good share of the obligations it imposes and to secure benefits not enjoyed by the other parties to it. Obviously, his alterations will not be effective nor will he be bound by any of the terms of the contract, unless the changes he proposes are assented to or others are agreed upon. If he does not care whether or not he enters into the contract, he may be quite reckless in the modifications he proposes; if he is intensely desirous of seeing it go into operation, he will naturally be more restrained lest the entire project fall through. That explains why the irreconcilables are perfectly agreeable to any reservation it may be desired to attach to the treaty.

The process of Americanizing the treaty, as Republican Senators have delighted to call their treatment of it, has gone on as though there were no other parties to be considered instead of as though the representatives of forty or more nations were sitting just beyond the walls of the Chamber in the marble room, for instance, every one of whom must be appeased. Senators seem to have forgotten their presence as much as they have closed their eyes to the fact that the President of the United States must give his approval to any changes proposed, even though they be denominated reservations. The idea has been conveyed that it rests with the Senate to fix up the treaty in any way it sees fit, without regard to the views of anyone on earth, and that opposition of any sort demonstrates a want of patriotism. It is held up as a virtue that any advantage of which the situation admits is improved to secure terms for the United States, according it privileges denied to and releasing it from obligations incurred by the other members. Some of us are restrained by our pride in the American character from voluntarily proposing such a covenant, and more believe that the United States abandons her position of primacy and leadership among the nations by entering into the league upon the conditions proposed. It is of no consequence to me that some of the leading powers may have signified their willingness, considering the desperate plight of the world, to accede to the terms upon which the Senate proposes we enter the league. I have no disposition to see my country dealing in this great crisis with the other powers, much less the feeble nations which have become members of the league, in the spirit of the conscienceless usurer, and I shrink from having it classed with those which even in the field of diplomacy find that—

> The good old rule
> Sufficeth them, the simple plan
> That they should take who have the power,
> And they should keep who can.

I indulge in these reflections to expose the considerations which have moved me to oppose consistently the reservations proposed. I regret the adoption of most of them, but they are supported stoutly by men as high-minded as I can claim to be, no less jealous of the honor of the country, confided for a time in large part to the Members of this body. They see, apparently, no impropriety in tendering to the other associated nations our membership in the league upon the considerations set out in the reservations. Reluctantly I yield my judgment to theirs on that point, and, having dismissed it, the path of duty is perfectly clear to me—so clear that in my conviction there is "no variableness, neither shadow of turning."

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, we are about to take a final vote on the treaty of peace with Germany, including the covenant of the League of Nations, adopted at Versailles on the 28th of last June. It is 16 months since the armistice was signed, and the treaty has been under discussion in the Senate for more than 12 months. Personally, I was satisfied with it as framed by the 28 nations which signed it after six months of intense labor, and have voted consistently to secure its ratification without change by opposing all amendments, though I have voted for several interpretative reservations. It is very unfortunate for mankind that the treaty could not have been ratified promptly without serious change, but fate decreed otherwise, and the reservations which have been adopted by the Senate amend it in several material points, some of which are doubtless wise. The question now is whether to vote in favor of the treaty as amended or against it; we are obliged to take it as it is, or reject it wholly; there is no middle ground.

The treaty as presented to us was "far from being a perfect document; it was made in a time of world demoralization—shell shock—it represents the fears and greeds of the nations as well as the hopes and aspirations. But the hopes and aspirations are there—put there by President Wilson, and no one else"; and in its present emasculated form the "treaty contains the new machinery, the new principles for world reconstruction on a broader basis of justice and right than was ever known before."

The covenant of the league, though greatly changed and in some respects much weakened, is a powerful instrument for good and still entitled to be called an international charter for peace. Its provisions are unchanged in regard to: (a) The assembly—a parliament of man—which finds the facts in disputes between nations and brings to bear on them the force of world public opinion; (b) Submission to arbitration of all matters likely to lead to rupture, and an agreement not to resort to war in any case until three months after award of arbitrators; (c) Establishment of a permanent court of international justice; (d) Invoking an international boycott against a covenant-breaking State; (e) Mutual support for many proper purposes among members of the league; and (f) Reduction of national armaments subject to our right to increase them if threatened with war. Indeed, the covenant of the league creates a union or federation of all the nations of the earth for peace; and, even if faulty in many respects and subject to the mistakes in execution which attend worldly affairs, it is bound to result in incalculable good to humanity if carried out even partially in the spirit of its conception.

If the treaty be not ratified the war with Germany will continue indefinitely, though the last gun was fired 16 months ago, and innumerable problems will confront us in connection therewith. Great unrest and disquietude in our own country and throughout the world will prevail. We will lose the position of friend and "big brother" to many suffering peoples which our wealth, power, and manifest duty direct us to assume. In fact, we will be very remiss in our obligations to mankind if we do not become a party to the League of Nations. Under these circumstances, Mr. President, I deem it my plain duty to vote in favor of the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, it is with very grave reluctance and much misgiving that I announce my determination to vote again for the ratification of the proposed treaty of peace with Germany. In the beginning I favored framing and consideration of the peace treaty and the League of Nations separately. I believed then and believe now that that would have been the wiser course. I think we should have had a quick treaty of peace with Germany and her allies. Then we could have taken all the time desired to effectuate a League of Nations. However, as the decision was that we must consider the peace treaty and the League of Nations covenant together, I accepted that decision, and in the beginning of our consideration thereof I was strongly in favor of ratification of the joint document. I am not so strongly impressed with it now as I was then.

Already the League of Nations is beginning to show signs of failure and of inefficiency in operation. Among the provisions of the treaty is one which I find on page 90 of the printed document, article 227, which I now read:

ARTICLE 227.

The Allied and Associated Powers publicly arraign William II of Hohenzollern, formerly German Emperor, for a supreme offence against international morality and the sanctity of treaties.

A special tribunal will be constituted to try the accused, thereby assuring him the guarantees essential to the right of defence. It will be composed of five judges, one appointed by each of the following Powers: namely, the United States of America, Great Britain, France, Italy and Japan.

In its decision the tribunal will be guided by the highest motives of international policy, with a view to vindicating the solemn obligations of international undertakings and the validity of international morality. It will be its duty to fix the punishment which it considers should be imposed.

The Allied and Associated Powers will address a request to the Government of the Netherlands for the surrender to them of the ex-Emperor in order that he may be put on trial.

While, of course, the United States has not been allowed to take any part in that proceeding, the other nations mentioned have undertaken to do so, and they have utterly failed to carry it into effect. They have made a demand on Holland for the surrender of the most monstrous criminal of all the ages, only to be met with defiant refusal, and there the matter seems to end. The nations composing the League of Nations, as now constituted, seem to be afraid to undertake to carry out this solemn provision of the great instrument to which they have become parties—one of the most important provisions, I think, in the interest of justice that the entire document contains. The nations that constitute the League of Nations appear either to feel that they are powerless to carry out that provision or to be unwilling to undertake it. They either seem to think they are unable to cope with Holland, reinforced as she might be by Germany and all of the Central Powers, or else they are indifferent to carrying out one of the main provisions of the League of Nations covenant.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MYERS. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that the provision of the treaty to which he has just called attention is of paramount importance? Does not the Senator think—if I may be permitted another question—that the public sentiment in Great Britain and in some parts of France is against the execution of that provision of the treaty, and that the Allies themselves feel that if they attempted to take the Kaiser and try him by a court as contemplated by the League of Nations they would be making a martyr out of him and would be helping the cause of imperialism, as represented by the Kaiser's government, rather than advancing the cause of peace and carrying out the purposes for which the league was established?

Mr. MYERS. It is of supreme importance that justice be done, and justice can not be done in the matter of the most monstrous crime in the history of the world without some punishment. Justice can not be done without punishment where there is crime and wrongdoing. The entire structure of jurisprudence in all civilized nations in the world is based upon the theory that in order to obtain justice there must be some punishment for wrongdoing; and if there ever was a wrong in the history of all the world that demanded severity and certainty of punishment, I think the wrong done by this monster of iniquity, the Emperor of Germany, demands punishment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Sentor yield again?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. KING. I do not think the Senator ought to draw the inference that the league is inefficacious or has ceased to function, or is weakened, because it has failed to take possession of the Kaiser and try him, and possibly execute him. While conceding the Senator's general academic statement as to the processes of justice and the necessity of administering justice, he knows that frequently a Government will pass a criminal statute and some person who has violated the law flees and takes refuge in some unknown country, and it is impossible to execute the law. It ought not to be said that the law is a failure, or that the Government is weak and inefficacious in the administration of justice, because it does not happen to execute the law against that particular culprit.

Mr. MYERS. That is because there is no power of extradition; but this is a world offense, and there should be no asylum in all the world for this monster of iniquity. The only way in which it should be possible for him to escape the clutches of justice should be for him to remove himself from the universe, and thereby put it beyond the power of the League of Nations to lay the hand of justice upon him. In this particular the League of Nations has not yet begun to function. It has not made a beginning. It has made a failure, right at the beginning, to function in one of its most important provisions. If it was not intended to carry out this provision, the framers should not have put it in the league covenant.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield once more?

Mr. MYERS. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me for making this observation, I do not think he ought to say that the League of Nations has ceased to function in this particular. The League of Nations was organized for the purpose of preserving international law. Holland was not a member of the League of Nations. She was not a party to the treaty. Under the well-known principles of international law established by a great Dutchman more than 200 years ago, she had a right, not being a member of the league, to deny the demands of the League of Nations for the turning over to them of the Kaiser; and because the League of Nations did not resort to military pressure against an unoffending nation, such as Holland is, I do not think the Senator ought to say that the League of Nations has ceased to function, at least in this respect. I think that the League of Nations in respecting the attitude of Holland, regrettable though it may be in the eyes of many, has exemplified a regard for international law and justice that in the end must be the basis of any League of Nations, and which regard must obtain if there shall ever be a League of Nations perpetuated.

Mr. MYERS. The League of Nations has not ceased to function in this particular. It never began to function in this particular. It could not cease until it made a beginning and it has not made a beginning. No citizen of a country has a right to harbor a criminal and shield him from justice, and no nation of the world has a right to harbor an international criminal who is indicted for a supreme offense against international morality and the sanctity of treaties. Holland should be taught that she has no right to protect the greatest criminal of the world, that she making herself particeps criminis when she does so, and is shielding a criminal from just punishment and defying the constituted authorities of the world. The League of Nations, if necessary, should invade Holland, should go into Holland, get this infamous wretch, and drag him before the bar that was constituted by this provision, and try him for his gross crimes and supreme offenses against international morality and the sanctity of treaties.

I find here, in the league covenant, further, articles 228, 229, and 230. I read them:

ARTICLE 228.

The German Government recognizes the right of the Allied and Associated Powers to bring before military tribunals persons accused of having committed acts in violation of the laws and customs of war. Such persons shall, if found guilty, be sentenced to punishments laid down by law. This provision will apply notwithstanding any proceedings or prosecution before a tribunal in Germany or in the territory of her allies.

The German Government shall hand over to the Allied and Associated Powers, or to such one of them as shall so request, all persons accused of having committed an act in violation of the laws and customs of war, who are specified either by name or by the rank, office or employment which they held under the German authorities.

ARTICLE 229.

Persons guilty of criminal acts against the nationals of one of the Allied and Associated Powers will be brought before the military tribunals of that Power.

Persons guilty of criminal acts against the nationals of more than one of the Allied and Associated Powers will be brought before military tribunals composed of members of the military tribunals of the Powers concerned.

In every case the accused will be entitled to name his own counsel.

ARTICLE 230.

The German Government undertakes to furnish all documents and information of every kind, the production of which may be considered necessary to ensure the full knowledge of the incriminating acts, the discovery of offenders and the just appreciation of responsibility.

Under those provisions, the League of Nations, as now constituted and operating, made out a list of a number of generals and officials of Germany whom it indicted as having committed acts in violation of the laws and customs of war, and made a demand for their surrender by the German Government. That demand was defiantly and impudently refused, and not one of the offenders has been surrendered to the duly constituted authorities of the League of Nations, upon the demand of the league; and there the matter seems to end. The League of Nations does not seem disposed to do one thing toward carrying out its demands. It seems to have simply backed down, to have surrendered, abdicated its rights under this provision of the League of Nations covenant, and there the matter rests. Germany has announced that she will not surrender one of the numerous persons demanded, but that she will proceed to try them by her own tribunals and in her own way, and will do as she may please to do with them. So I am greatly disappointed about the efficacy and the functioning of the League of Nations. My fond hope of its efficiency, efficacy, and successful operation has received a sad blow; and I do not have nearly so much confidence in the benefits of the League of Nations as I had when the subject first began to receive consideration at the last preceding session of the Congress.

What a farce to contemplate, what a grotesque farce, what a monstrosity, for Germany to say that she will try her own accused in her own courts and in her own way, and will pay no attention whatever to the demands of the League of Nations for the surrender of well-known criminals!

Germany try them? You might as well put a bootlegger on trial before a jury of bootleggers. You might as well put on trial a man who is charged with selling liquor in violation of law and do it before a jury of bartenders.

You might as well try a horse thief before a jury of 12 horse thieves. You might as well try a rapist before a jury of 12 rapists. Nobody expects anything to come of these mock trials in Germany. They are simply travesties on justice. They are already starting out to make a travesty on the powers of the League of Nations.

The nations which now constitute the League of Nations seem either to be afraid of Germany or indifferent to their own provisions. They either fear that they are not able to cope with Germany in the matter of the enforcement of their demands, or they think these provisions amount to nothing. If they amount to nothing, they should not have been put in the league covenant.

It has been claimed on the floor of the Senate in the last few months that the provisions of the peace treaty with Germany are too severe on Germany. That claim has been made here as an objection to the ratification of the treaty and League of Nations. I think the terms of the peace treaty are entirely too lenient with Germany. It is one of my chief objections to the peace treaty and League of Nations combined that the terms are entirely too lenient with Germany.

We have been too lenient with Germany from the beginning. We have heard very much talk to the effect that the people of Germany were not to blame for the war, that they were merely led about by a sort of a process of hypnotism, and were led into this war and its extravagancies and cruelties by the German Kaiser and a score of war lords. I think the people of Germany are just as much to blame as are the Kaiser and the German war lords. The German Kaiser and his war lords could not have declared this war and could not have carried it on in all of its frightfulness and monstrosity if it had not been backed by the spirit and will of the German people.

For generations the people of Germany have been taught in drinking toasts to each other to drink to "Der Tag," the day when Germany would wage war against all of the world and conquer the world.

In the first place, I do not think there should have been any armistice with Germany and the Central Powers. I think the armistice was a grave mistake. I think it was the greatest mistake in the history of the world in a thousand years, and it has had most deplorable results. The people of Germany do not believe they have been whipped. The people of Germany feel that they have not been defeated. The people of that country feel that they are still supreme, and that is one reason why the present Government of Germany refuses to surrender to the authorities of the League of Nations the criminals who have been indicted by authority of that league and whose surrender has been demanded. That is one reason why they refuse to make any move toward the surrender of the Kaiser or any of his war lords who were joint criminals in his offenses.

I contend that when Germany made application for an armistice there should have been but one answer, and that answer should have been "unconditional surrender." This war should have been prosecuted upon German soil to a termination of unconditional surrender by the German armies and their allies. It should have been carried to German soil and the Germans should have been given a taste of their own warfare. In that event I believe that unconditional surrender would have come about in less than 30 days more. I have talked with many returned officers and soldiers who saw service in France and who were stationed along the Rhine in Germany after the armistice went into effect, and almost without exception they say that if an answer of unconditional surrender had been given to the application for an armistice and if the war had been prosecuted to a termination of unconditional surrender it could not have lasted 30 days longer; that the Germans were ready to capitulate, their morale was gone, their supplies were gone, and that a large part of their army could have been encompassed and captured in less than 30 days.

Had that been done, instead of finding a defiant Germany right now, at the beginning of the operations of the League of Nations, defying the constituted authorities of the League of Nations, refusing to comply with demands made upon her; instead of that we could have had a League of Nations capable of doing justice and carrying out without serious resistance its mandates in the interest of justice. As it is, I look for further trouble with Germany. The Entente Allies have already backed down from two of their demands on Germany. They have already been successfully defied twice by a defiant Germany, by a Government which feels that it is not conquered, and by a people who feel that they are still supreme, and that an armistice was only brought about by negotiation and by some mistake on the part of their officers.

Instead of that, the spirit of Germany should have been crushed; it should have been ground into atoms. Germany should have been brought to the earth and ground into the dust of the earth, so she would not have any spirit to revive in defiance of constituted authorities for a thousand years to come. The German nation should have been dismembered, the States that composed it should have been separated and forbidden, in my opinion, to constitute any longer a central power under one general government.

Had that been the case we would not find the defiance that now exists in Germany and that confronts the League of Nations in the first demands that have been made upon Germany, in the very first steps that they have taken to carry out provisions of the League of Nations, and which have been met with abject refusal right at the threshold of the door of the better day for which we had hoped.

More than that, in line with this spirit which I contend shows entirely too much leniency for Germany and which shows a disposition to back down from the very first demands that are made upon her, we hear very serious talk in the United States and among the Entente Allies to the effect that we must help Germany to get on her feet; that we must extend help to Germany. The idea of extending help to Germany, the nation that has brought on all of the misery and wretchedness and woe that exists in the world to-day as a result of the great war that shook civilization to its foundations and came perilously near to destroying the civilized world.

Help Germany! It is the first time I ever heard advocated the doctrine that if a brute of a monster ravishes your wife and your daughter, cuts their throats, burns down the building over them and incinerates their bodies, when he is arrested and put in jail it is your duty to go around to the jail and see that he has a comfortable bed to lie upon at night and plenty of food to eat. That is a new doctrine to me. It is analogous, too, to the case of Germany. Germany did all of those things and more, too.

We have, too, another proposition that will apparently follow in the wake of the League of Nations. When the League of Nations is perfected and gets into complete operation, it appears to be the design to take Germany in as one of the members of the League of Nations, and that feature of it is highly repugnant to me. I never before heard, if a brute of a monster ravishes your wife and daughter, when he is arrested for it and it is proven on him, that you should invite him into your home and to your dinner table—invite him to sit in your family as a guest. That is entirely a new doctrine to me, and I think it repugnant to every sense of decency, every principle for which the war against German militarism, brutality, and Prussianism was waged. I am not in sympathy with that manifest tendency which seems to pervade the League of Nations, as at present constituted, to extend help to Germany and to extend help also to Bolshevist Russia. We have it from newspaper reports that the powers that be in Great Britain are now actually contemplating extending help, through the League of Nations, and recognition to the Bolshevist government in Russia. If that is to be the tendency of the League of Nations, I am sadly disappointed at it. To extend help to a class of people who have violated and are violating every instinct of decency, every rule of morality; who have committed every crime known to the decalogue; who have done everything in their power to pull down the smoldering remains of the world, after the mightiest conflagration in the history of all time, and to bring them to a condition of complete destruction, anarchy, and chaos, is to me unthinkable. I do not believe in helping such people. I believe that the heavy hand of power and extermination should be applied to such people as rule Russia to-day, as well as those in Germany who have defied the plain mandate of the League of Nations to carry out plain provisions of the league.

It has already been announced by authorities in Germany that they will comply with only so many of the provisions of the peace treaty and League of Nations, so many of the terms imposed upon Germany, as they may see fit to carry out and may consider not detrimental to the welfare of Germany. The new government, which has lately assumed the rôle of governing power in Germany and which has undertaken to overthrow the government that was established a few months ago, has already come out boldly, frankly, openly with that statement; and I think, if we are to get anything at all out of Germany in accordance with the terms imposed—that is, when I say "we" I mean the United States and the Entente Allies, if the United States goes into the League of Nations—that the League of Nations may consider itself fortunate in obtaining compliance with any of the terms imposed upon Germany—any at all.

It looks very much now as if there might be revolution and counter-revolution in Germany, and for a long time to come conflict waged upon her territory by contending forces, each contending to be the true government, and neither one willing to bow in submission to the terms imposed upon Germany by the League of Nations. In fact, I rather suspect that the present revolution is the result of a preconceived agreement among the people of Germany merely to plunge Germany into internecine warfare, chaos, and anarchy in order that they may say, "We have no responsible government to comply with your terms; there is no responsible government here to comply with any agreement."

It is a good deal as if you sold goods to the firm of Jones, Smith & Brown and are told, "That firm is dissolved; its members are no longer operating together; Jones is out of it, Smith is out of it, Brown is out of it; you can not recover for your goods; you can not get any judgment against the firm for the firm is not in existence."

It seems to me the people of Germany are preparing to say that there is no Government there against which the league can enforce any judgment; that the Government which was in existence at the time terms were imposed upon and agreed to by Germany has gone out of existence. I look for the German people to say, "That Government has been wiped out of existence; it is not here any more; we are a new Government; we do not know anything about the terms to which the former Government subscribed." It seems to me that occurrences are simply leading up to that state of affairs, and I surmise very strongly that it is by agreement among the people of Germany.

Furthermore, and in addition to what I have said, there are provisions in the covenant of the League of Nations which do not have my approval and to which I am stoutly opposed. There are reservations on the resolution of ratification which do not have my approval and which I think have no proper place in a resolution of ratification, and which I think should have nothing to do with the League of Nations. Yet in spite of all that, I have some hope that if the United States should ratify the League of Nations and become a member of it we might be able to brace up the wavering spirit of the nations which are now in the League of Nations and encourage them, stimulate them, perhaps, to stand firmly, stoutly, resolutely, and unwaveringly for the rights of humanity and for the enforcement of justice.

I want to get the peace treaty out of the way. I want to be done with it. I believe the people of the country want it out of the way, and I am willing once more to vote for ratification in the hope that when the United States becomes a member of the league conditions may become better and that we may be able to rescue what seems to be the failing ability or disposition of the League of Nations to enforce justice and inflict a modicum of punishment for wrongs that have been done, and to bring the world out of the chaos which now prevails and the abyss into which it is rapidly sinking deeper and more hopelessly.

Should the great and powerful United States Government join the League of Nations I have some hope that it may help to bring order out of chaos and to stop the downward career of the civilization of the world from the course of destruction upon which it now seems to be launched.

So I have determined once more to vote for ratification of this pact. I have voted for it twice, and I am going to vote for it once more, and if it fails of ratification this time I do not know whether or not I shall ever vote for it again. If I should have occasion to vote for it again, as I hope I may not, for I hope it may be ratified this time, I think now I would have to have some proof, more than I have had, of the efficacy of the League of Nations in operation.

I look with regret upon the prospect of having to wait one whole year before there can be another effort for ratification of the League of Nations, if it should be rejected at this time. There is no telling what might happen in 12 months more of time in the present state of affairs, the present tendency of the world, the present unsettled condition of affairs, the apparent impotency of the League of Nations as now constituted to enforce its decrees. There is no telling what might happen to the world in the next 12 months, and I look with alarm upon the prospect of having to remain in this state of uncertainty and indecision for 12 months more. Therefore, though I am not at all satisfied so far with the workings of the League of Nations, and am not satisfied with the pact itself, nor with all of the reservations which have been put upon the resolution of ratification, yet, in the hope of bettering conditions, I shall once more cast my vote for ratification.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, for the second time we are approaching a vote upon the ratification, with reservations, of our peace treaty with Germany and the covenant of the League of Nations. I regard it as of utmost importance that the resolution of ratification be approved by the requisite number of Senators. If this is not done now I have no hope that favorable action will take place for 12 months. The natural thing for us to do, and the proper thing, if the requisite two-thirds vote is not cast for ratification, would be to return the treaty at once to the President with notice to him that the Senate has failed of ratification and let the responsibility be upon him for future action.

THE NEED OF COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH GERMANY.

I can not conceive that it would be useful for us to retain the treaty after two ineffectual efforts at ratification. We must then remain in a technical state of war with Germany. We have no representatives in Germany, consuls or otherwise. Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan have resumed their full commercial relations with Germany. The United States alone of the great powers is at least neglecting its commercial interests in this respect.

If we fail to ratify the treaty we fail to place our representative with the council in Europe upon the reparation commission and in position to represent our country in the adjustments that are still pending, of vast importance to our own business and to the interests of European countries; we fail to give our influence fully to help quiet the still disturbed conditions of Europe and to lessen the danger of economic chaos that threatens that great continent and which, happening there, will affect us most seriously.

THE PRESIDENT'S OBJECTIONS UNSOUND.

If we looked upon it only from a selfish standpoint, if we did not realize our duty to the troubled and suffering people of Europe, which, of course, we do, the treaty should be ratified without further delay. I regret that it was not ratified last November. I regretted at the time the letter of the President which seriously interfered with ratification. I think that letter was a mistake. I think the ground upon which he put it was entirely unsound.

He declared that the reservations nullified the treaty. Why, Mr. President, this was a most unfortunate expression on account of its entire lack of accuracy. Nullify the treaty? Not at all. Certain provisions of the treaty were denied operation upon our country but the real heart of the treaty was left in full operation.

I maintain, Mr. President, that the provisions in these reservations which relieve the United States from the operation of certain features of the treaty are essential and right. No one can successfully contest the proposition that each of those reservations, where the United States is freed from the effect of a provision of the league covenant, is a reservation essential to Americanism, essential to the preservation of the plan of government handed down to us by our forefathers and to which we are all devoted. I have the privilege of knowing that three of my ancestors fought for the freedom of the Colonies, one from Virginia, one from North Carolina, one from Massachusetts. They helped give us, at the risk of their lives, the system of government that blesses this country, and if God spares my life I will never cast a vote knowingly to sacrifice our plan of government, but I will seek to hand it down to my descendants.

Let us see whether the treaty was nullified. Mark it. I insist that if the President had said certain provisions of the treaty were nullified he would have been right; and I add that they ought to have been nullified; but when the President says the treaty was nullified he used an unfortunate and inaccurate expression.

ARBITRATION PRINCIPLES ARE "HEART" OF TREATY.

What is left in the treaty? That has already been so splendidly presented to you by Senators who have preceded me that I hesitate to state. I heard the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Ohio, and it would be impossible for me to equal their convincing presentation of the valuable provisions of the treaty which are untouched by reservations. Still I shall refer to them briefly.

The treaty provides that both the assembly and the council shall deal at their meetings "with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world." It places the responsibility both upon the council and upon the assembly of considering all problems which may affect the peace of the world. It places upon them the responsibility of using their moral influence, and thus all members of the league must use their good offices and moral influence and to adjust differences and prevent war. It goes further and obligates them to adjust differences and requires nations to refrain from war pending adjustments and for three months thereafter. Let me call your attention to article 11, which the President at one time said was dearer to him than any article in the treaty:

Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations. In case any such emergency should arise the secretary general shall on the request of any member of the league forthwith summon a meeting of the council.

It is also declared to be the friendly right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

Article 12 provides:

The members of the league agree that if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council.

To article 13 and article 14 there are no reservations; article 15 is changed in but one respect. Article 15 provides that whenever a dispute arises and is not submitted to arbitration it shall be submitted to the council unless the dispute is claimed by one of the parties to involve a domestic question, in which case provision is made for the council to determine whether it is domestic. By a reservation we decline to submit to that clause of article 15 we change, and we ought to have declined.

Article 16 provides:

Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13, or 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a member of the league or not.

It shall be the duty of the council in such case to recommend to the several Governments concerned what effective military, naval, or air force the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league.

In the meantime the commercial boycott is enforced.

MORAL AND NOT PHYSICAL FORCE SHOULD CONTROL.

Mr. President and Senators, when the President of the United States was in Paris and accepted a degree from the French Academy he declared his conception of a League of Nations to be:

My conception of the League of Nations is just this: That it shall operate as the organized moral force throughout the world, and that whenever and wherever wrong and aggression are planned or contemplated this searching light of conscience will be turned upon them, and men everywhere will ask, What are the purposes you hold in your hearts against the fortunes of the world?

Thus it was the President's plan to organize a League of Nations where moral force was to control. There seemed to be no thought then of a resort to physical force. There seemed not to have been in his mind when those words were spoken any desire to put an obligation upon this country to send our boys to the wars of the world without independent action by Congress at the time they were to be sent.

All the moral power that this covenant could have given is retained in it—the obligation to arbitrate; the obligation to refer questions to the council; the obligation to refrain from war for three months after the award is made; the obligation to accept the award or at least not to go to war at all if one of the parties to the arbitration did accept the decision, and then if one nation goes to war despite this obligation, it is declared to be an act of war against all the remaining members of the league, and the warring nation is at once to be punished by commercial boycott. The league is left with just as much power as I would dare have it left with. If I hesitate in my judgment, it is as to whether there is not too much power still left to the league.

Now, let us see what has been eliminated; let us consider some of the reservations. No one who believes in the League of Nations, no one who believes in the power of associated nations to adjust differences in order to prevent war, can question that there is left in the league covenant a vast power for good. Those who do not believe in it at all may object, but those who advocate a league find here provisions stronger than we have ever before contemplated. I believe it may do good; I believe in the moral power, the suspension of action, the agreement to refrain from going to war, the opportunity for cooling time, and the probability that we may prevent war by substituting negotiation and adjustment.

WHAT THE VARIOUS RESERVATIONS MEAN.

Now, let us see what are the reservations and why any friend of the covenant should hesitate to vote for them. I can not understand how any one who believes in the covenant can for a moment now hesitate to support ratification. First, we know that there will be no chance to modify these reservations in any substantial way in 12 months. We know that at the end of that time there are 36 Senators who will remain in the Senate for two years longer who will oppose modifying the reservations in any substantial way. We know, furthermore, if we are willing to look the truth in the face, that there will be just as many of the Senators elected this fall who will be in favor of vigorous reservations as there are now here.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. I would like to ask the Senator if he recalls having recently said that, with the lapse of time, the league and the treaty became progressively more unpopular in this Chamber and in the country?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not say that. I will repeat what I did say. I said that when the instrument first reached the United States there were many more people in favor of ratification without reservations than there are now, but that the conviction that reservations were necessary has grown stronger and stronger with the lapse of time; and I repeat that statement now.

I believe a large majority of the American people favor ratification of the league covenant with substantially the reservations that are now presented. I believe there is a small minority that would reject it altogether, and perhaps a small minority that would be willing to take it without reservations at all; but I believe that the middle ground is sound and that it represents the thought of a large majority of the people of the United States.

RESERVATION NO. 1 AND THE RIGHT OF WITHDRAWAL.

Now, Mr. President, I take up the first reservation. What objection has any friend of the treaty to it? It is the reservation declaring that if we enter the league and give two years' notice of withdrawal we alone shall pass upon the question as to whether we have fulfilled our obligations and have the right to withdraw. Let us see what first came to us in March of last year. There was then no provision for withdrawal at all, but we were told that, of course, any country could withdraw if it wanted to at any time it wished.

Some of us recalled, however, that the 13 Colonies once joined together and formed the United States, and that the theory was for a long time held that any one of them could withdraw whenever its citizens desired. When the President went back to Paris instead of promptly adding a provision that any nation or member could withdraw at pleasure the privilege of withdrawing was limited by a two-year notice, with the further provision that the nation then could not withdraw unless all its obligations had been fulfilled, so that it was not at first intended that any nation could withdraw at pleasure. Now, under the language of the league covenant who would determine whether the withdrawing nation had performed all of its obligations? It does not say that the nation seeking to withdraw shall decide that question for itself; it leaves the question to be decided necessarily by the council or the assembly of the league, and as there is no provision for less than a unanimous vote on this subject under the terms of the covenant, every member must vote that the member desiring to withdraw has performed its duties or the right of withdrawal would be denied.

Are we willing to base our right of withdrawal upon any such situation? We add to our rights by declaring that we join this league with the distinct reservation that if we give the two years' notice of intention to withdraw we will ourselves alone determine the question as to whether we have fulfilled our obligations, and we will not leave that question to the council or to the assembly of the League of Nations. I concede that the provision contained in that reservation is in addition to anything in the league covenant; but it ought to be there, and we ought to require it, and I do not believe there is a Senator on this side of the Chamber who does not deem it proper to require it.

I discussed a few minutes ago article 15, and I called attention to its importance. I stated that it was left without change, excepting in one regard.

OUR RIGHT TO DECIDE WHAT ARE DOMESTIC QUESTIONS.

Articles 12, 13, and 15 require members either to arbitrate all differences or to refer them to the council. The eighth paragraph of article 15 provides that if a member with a dispute brought before the council claims that the dispute involves a domestic question the council shall consider the question to determine whether it is domestic or not, and if it finds that under international law "it is solely a domestic question"—I quote the language—then the council shall not proceed; but unless the council finds that by rules of international law the question is "solely a domestic question," then the council goes on and acts upon it.

I am unwilling, the American people are unwilling, for any council of seven foreigners to determine for us whether a problem which we insist is domestic is in fact domestic or international; and our reservation provides that the United States alone will pass upon domestic questions, and the United States alone will determine for itself whether a particular dispute involves a domestic or an international question; and if the United States determines that it is domestic, the council and the league shall not touch it, and the reservation goes further and names immigration as a domestic question which we will not allow the council or the assembly to touch.

I admit that this reservation nullifies a provision in article 15, and it ought to be nullified. Without nullifying it, I could not vote to ratify this treaty. It is no new question in the United States or in the Senate of the United States. In the winter of 1911 and 1912 we had up for consideration the universal arbitration treaty with Great Britain. In it there was the broadest language for the arbitration of disputes. In it there was a provision that if a dispute arose as to whether a particular question should be arbitrated, a board was to pass upon it. I remember the deep interest of my then colleague, the senior Democratic Senator upon the Committee on Foreign Relations, Mr. Bacon, in placing upon that treaty a reservation declaring that we would allow no arbitration of our domestic questions, and we would allow no board to decide for us what were domestic questions, but that the United States would for itself decide what was a domestic question, and, having so decided, would permit no interference by any country with such a question; and when the final vote was had every Democrat voted for the reservation, and a considerable majority upon the Republican side of the Chamber voted for the reservation, though able Republican Senators had championed the treaty.

The only thing we take out of article 15 is the authority for the council to determine for us whether a particular question, which we claim to be domestic, is or is not domestic; and the language of the covenant does not allow the council to hold that it is a domestic question, unless the council finds, by international law, that it is "solely a domestic question." There are many questions which we regard as domestic that might not be established by rules of international law as "solely domestic," and we provide wisely in one of these reservations that the council shall not determine for us whether a question is domestic or international, but if our Government decides that a question is domestic, we withdraw it from arbitration or from consideration by the council.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. KING. I want to invite the Senator's attention, with his permission, to the fact that the asservation was made constantly, if not by Mr. Wilson, at least by many who were at the peace conference, that there was no intention that any article of the projected league—this was before the treaty was formed, and even afterwards—or any article of the projected covenant—and, after the covenant was formed, no article in the covenant—should restrict any signatory to the treaty in the exercise of control over its proper and legitimate domestic affairs. Obviously, those men who were at the peace conference knew that no nation would commit to an international tribunal the determination of its domestic and internal affairs. Does not the Senator think that the provision in the treaty which seems to commit to the international tribunal the determination of whether it is domestic or not is in violation of the preconvention understanding of what the terms of the treaty should be, and in contravention of the constant affirmations after the conference of Versailles as to what the objects and purposes of the treaty were? And does not the Senator believe that it was the intention of Mr. Wilson, and the intention of all those who participated in that great convention, not to restrict the signatories to the treaty in any of their proper and legitimate domestic and internal affairs?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thank the Senator for asking me the question. He states correctly, as I recall it, the discussion made public before the covenant was written, and the information brought to us as to the purposes of the council with reference to domestic questions. The difficulty is that when it was written down in black and white, it carried something that we did not expect it to carry. If the President had been conferring with the Senate and taking advice from the Senate at the time this language was written, he would quickly have had called to his attention the fact that in March, 1912, every Democrat in the Senate committed himself by his vote to a reservation that declined to allow any tribunal to decide for us what was and what was not a domestic question, and declined to allow any tribunal to pass upon any American domestic question.

Those who made our Constitution were wise when they provided that the President should negotiate a treaty with the "advice" of the Senate. For the welfare of our country this "advice" is most important.

Unfortunately he was not in touch with the Senate. Unfortunately he did not have the benefit of the advice that the Constitution offered him, if it did not require him to take. If he had used it, he would promptly have been told that this language could not be ratified by a Senate of the United States, that the American people would not stand for it, and that the Senate was committed upon the proposition with reference to domestic questions, and he would have been "advised" to omit it from the treaty.

I say that reservation does change a provision of the treaty. It nullifies the authority—if you use that word—of the council to determine whether a question which we claim to be domestic is or is not domestic, and anything less ought not to be contained in a reservation when we ratify this treaty.

NO MANDATORIES WITHOUT APPROVAL OF CONGRESS.

I come now to the reservation with reference to mandatories. We expressly declare in the reservation that no mandatory shall be placed upon the United States without the approval of Congress. Now, let us think about that a moment. Why, even Lord Grey understood the necessity for such a reservation. The original framework of this instrument, the league covenant, was the work of Gen. Smuts, an English citizen from South Africa. He naturally had in view the English system, where the ministry acts free from any interference by Parliament in all foreign matters; but the ministry must conduct its foreign relations as the House of Commons approves, or a vote of censure retires the ministry. The ministry in Great Britain is at all times subject to the House of Commons, and must resign or go to the country with an election if the House of Commons disapproves an act of the ministry. So that the whole people of Great Britain at all times speak in the action of the ministry. As drawn, and as the President's interpretation indicates, the representative of the United States on the council, one man 3,000 miles away, acting with the approval of the President, could accept a mandatory. And we would be setting up one-man government instead of popular government in the United States. We would be substituting for popular government practically a dictator, in the shape of the President. Our system of popular government is through the Senate and the House of Representatives, especially through the House of Representatives, who must go back to the people every two years and return to Washington voicing the wishes of the people, with the power of the people to change them every two years. Our plan of government contemplates government by the people of the United States, not by a single dictatorship of one man, and not even by the Senate and the House, because the House must go back to the people every two years, and appropriations can not be continued for the Army or Navy, unless each two years they voice the wishes of the American people.

What will a mandatory cost? Perhaps a billion a year and 250,000 boys policing some foreign country. Yet as drawn, while finally the appropriations must come from Congress, acceptance could be made through one man in Switzerland, speaking the wishes of the President.

I am not referring to the present President at all. There have been past Presidents and there will be future Presidents. I am referring to our system of government. I am unwilling for the instrument to be left in such shape that one man in Switzerland, following the direction of one man in the United States, can commit this country in grave and most important problems. I believe in keeping our representative who goes into this council and our members who go into the assembly close to the people and subject to the will of the American people, not only in connection with the mandatory, but in connection with the whole scheme of service. This can only be accomplished by requiring their authority fixed and directed by the Congress.

I am not prepared to say that as drawn the member of the council, acting for the President, could not accept an amendment to the covenant of the league. His powers are broad. They were modeled after the English plan of foreign representation, which, as I said before, is always subject to popular will, because the ministry must at once retire when the House of Commons disapproves the action of the ministry. But not so here. Our system is entirely different, and the framers of our Constitution never meant to put the powers in the President or in our foreign representatives that the English system places upon their ministry and foreign representatives. We Americanize the league covenant by providing that those who represent us abroad, growing out of this league, shall act in compliance with legislation passed by the Congress of the United States. My plea is not so much for the Congress as for the people, because the Congress constantly must respond to the wishes of the people.

THE TREATY'S LABOR PROVISIONS.

I come to another reservation. Part XIII of the treaty, a part of the League of Nations, creates an international labor organization with complicated and legislative authority. Just the limit of its authority I am not prepared to declare. It goes to the extent of the right to cite a government before it for an explanation of its conduct. Who would be the members of that international labor congress? We have been trying in recent months to get out of the United States some foreign labor agitators. What will be their scheme? What will they do? What confusion will they add to our domestic situation?

One of the powers of this labor organization is to print a paper at the expense of the Government and distribute it throughout the respective countries. I believe in American labor as a body. The worst troubles we have had, I concluded from the testimony presented before the Committee on Education and Labor in the steel investigation, were produced by foreign agitators. Yet we are to transfer our labor problems largely to an international labor organization. I am utterly opposed to going into that international labor organization, and a reservation declares that the United States will not participate unless hereafter Congress determines that it is wise to do so.

Do you not all know that the representatives of most of the foreign countries in that labor congress will be socialists or worse? In the interest of the labor of the United States, I would keep out. In the interest of the industries of the United States, I would keep out. And a reservation does this for us. This treaty could not command the votes of one-third of the Senate with Part XIII in it. It is unfortunate that the President did not keep in touch with the Senators and take their advice before he consented to put that provision in this treaty.

I have not heard a Senator open his lips to defend it. If it has had a friend on the floor, I can not recall it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK (in his seat). Oh, yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Who?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Senator HENDERSON and myself.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Defended that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. You mean the labor part?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I am sorry to add to his other faults the fact that he defended this labor organization in the treaty. I do not know whether that was one of the ways by which he wished to kill the treaty, because he advocated the retention of provisions that never could have received the support of half the Senate. I think the Senator from Nebraska, unfortunately, in the opening of the discussion committed himself to the treaty without any reservations, and explained to us a number of times upon the floor, and to the public through the press, that it would certainly be passed without any reservations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; never.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, I understand that two Senators defended it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. GORE. Those two Senators are perhaps like the 16-year-old girl when she was kissed by her 80-year-old sweetheart. She said nothing made her sick.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly that provision can not possibly stand in a ratified treaty. I do not believe a representative of a labor organization in my State approves it.

The natural effect of such an organization would be to seek to equalize the pay of labor all over the world, and as ours are the best paid the equalizing process would pull them down.

WE SHOULD HAVE AS MANY VOTES AS BRITAIN.

Let us turn for a moment to the reservation with reference to Great Britain's six votes to our one. None of us object to Canada's coming in, but really I think New York or Texas might just as well have a representative, also. Are not New York and Texas to as complete an extent self-governing States as Canada? Six votes to the British Empire, with her representatives, and one to the United States! Some one in the conference was looking after British interests.

There is a reservation modifying that provision. I want Canada to have a vote. I want Australia to have a vote. I just want America to have as many votes in some way as the British Empire has; that is all. I am not uneasy about their treating us unfairly. They will trade us out of our boots if we do not watch. But if we have not sense enough in trade to take care of ourselves, we ought to take the consequences.

But when it comes to a final assembly, with power almost of legislation, I want as many votes when our affairs are concerned as Great Britain has.

I believe in the closest relations between Great Britain and the United States. I believe in standing up for each other in trouble, and, just as the English vessels at Manila cleared for action when the German vessels threatened Admiral Dewey, I would have our vessels ready all over the world, with directions, if the British were in danger, to clear and stand by them. But you know even your brother, when you trade with him, sometimes needs to be watched, unless you want to give him all you have; and Great Britain usually beats us trading.

You can not go before the American people and defend the proposition that you want the British Empire to have six votes and the United States only one. I do not know how they will fix it, but they ought to fix it.

IS ARTICLE 10 THE HEART OF THE LEAGUE?

Now, I come to the real reservation which causes dispute. I pass by a number that guarantee control through legislation of our representative in the council and prevent him from becoming the one-man representative of this entire country with the vast powers carried through the league covenant. We keep him by reservations in touch and under direction of the Senate and the House of Representatives, the latter of which every two years must respond to their constituents. Thus we seek to preserve government by the people and avoid mere one-man power.

I come to article 10. Let us see what is in it:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve against external aggression the territorial integrity and political independence of all members of the league.

We do not propose to remove the word "respect." The United States always has respect for the governments and territory of other countries. What I object to is the obligation to "preserve," not for 1 year, not for 2 years, not for 10 years, but until we get out of the league, the territory and government of every member. It is an obligation not put upon us and our children alone; if we stay in the league it is put upon our grandchildren and our great-grandchildren; it is put upon children still unborn. What are we undertaking to do? We are undertaking to decide now that we will obligate generations unborn to furnish their boys and their money to intervene in practically every war that will come upon the earth. There is no heart in it at all. It is war. It is iron and steel and shells and battleships that we are pledging. That is not the League of Nations which the President talked about before the French Academy. There, as I showed you, he believed in a league with moral power, nothing more. This is a league pledged to war.

But let me show you once more, as I have already done, how the principle the President started with has been abandoned. In his first draft he used this language:

> The contracting parties unite in guaranteeing to each other political independence and territorial integrity, but it is understood between them that such territorial readjustments, if any, as may in the future become necessary by reason of changes in present racial conditions and aspirations or present social and political relationships, pursuant to the principle of self-determination, and also such territorial readjustments as may, in the judgment of three-fourths of the delegates, be demanded by the wellfare and manifested interest of the peoples concerned, may be affected, if agreeable to those peoples.
> The contracting powers accept without reservation the principle that the peace of the world is superior in importance to every question of political jurisdiction or boundary.

Now, there was heart, but the council did not accept it. They struck it all out; they struck out every provision for considering the condition of subject people. The President is mistaken when he says article 10 is the heart of the league. Article 10 had heart before the council struck it out, but it is gone. There was a provision in it by which Egypt could have been heard, or Ireland could have been heard, or Korea could have been heard. Instead of that they now add a subject people by giving Shantung to Japan; they add a subject people by Great Britain taking Mesopotamia; they add a subject people by France taking Syria, and with 600,000,000 subject people governed by nations of the league we pledge ourselves to furnish our boys to preserve their territorial and political integrity, not for to-morrow, not for five years, but forever.

We have the word of the President in his address before the peace conference on January 25, 1919, that the conditions left by the peace treaty will bring wars. At that time and place he used this language:

> We are here to see that every people in the world shall choose its own masters and govern its own destinies, not as we wish, but as they wish. We are here to see, in short, that the very foundations of this war are swept away. * * * Those foundations were the holding together of empires of unwilling subjects by the duress of arms, and nothing less than the emancipation will accomplish peace.

Now, we are told that this kind of a pledge means peace; that with this kind of military organization, this powerful military alliance in the league pledged to mutual support, no other country would dare to fight. Why, Senators, do we forget history?

It was about 100 years ago that the great league of peace of England, France, Germany, Austria, and Russia was formed, and it was then claimed with this great and powerful league of peace wars were to end, for its power was so great that no one nation would dare, against its will, to engage in war; and yet old Adam was still in the people of these nations. Before the end of 10 years they were fighting each other. This league with us in it would not be as powerful relative to the strength of the balance of the world as was the one 100 years ago. It did not stop war.

Why, Mr. President, the States of the United States were tied together under the greatest Constitution, the greatest form of government God ever helped man to make. They got into a fight among themselves. I will not say that it was over a difference of construction of the instrument. I feel sure the Southern States felt they had the constitutional right to quit.

The New England States thought at one time they had the constitutional right, held their celebrated Hartford Convention, and came very near quitting. They had a little better judgment than the folks down my way. They concluded the best thing was not to quit, and thank God there is not anyone in the United States now a citizen of the United States who does not love the Stars and Stripes and who does not prefer to be one of the citizens of a State of the United States than to be anywhere else in the world.

You will never stop war until you eradicate human nature from the human mind and the human body and human heart.

Again, they say, suppose these nations had been in a league when Germany raided Belgium; Germany and Austria would not have dared to go to war. What an absurd statement. Did not Germany, with Russia, Italy, France, and England on her neck, fire on the vessels of the United States and drive us into the war, too? Why would she have refrained before when she voluntarily drove us into it during the war?

The time to preserve peace among men is before they entirely lose their tempers. The time to preserve peace among nations is to teach the rule of negotiation, teach the rule of conference, develop the habit of conference, the habit of arbitration, and the real heart of this league, from which I hope for good, is in the provisions other than article 10—the provisions for conference, for consideration of national differences, for arbitration of national differences, the agreement not to go to war until three months after the award is made, and the agreement not then to go to war if one of the parties tenders compliance with the terms of the award. That is a splendid conception, that has the elements of peace, that has the elements of adjustment of differences. I regard it as one hundred fold more valuable than a threat of a fight made by article 10.

Mr. President, I wish to show that the provisions objected to now by Senators in this reservation to article 10 do not amount to anything. The provisions seriously objected to are:

The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country by the employment of its military or naval forces, its resources, or any form of economic discrimination under article 10.

That part of the reservation was presented substantially by my colleagues on this side of the Chamber as their offer at the bipartisan conference. It was either contained in the original bipartisan conference proposition or in the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. What is it that Senators object to?

They seem to be disturbed because the reservation to article 10 makes this statement:

The United States assumes no obligation to interfere in any way in controversies between nations, including all controversies relating to territorial integrity or political independence, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10.

I ask the Senators, seriously, if they think this proviso a matter of any importance? It was useles to insert it. Its insertion can not affect the treaty. The balance of the treaty, other than article 10, places the duty of members of the league to interfere and use their good offices in all controversies, whether the controversies relate to territorial integrity or political independence, and whether they are members of the league or not?

You can cut out article 10 and find in the balance of the articles provisions covering the portion of article 10 stricken by reservations. All through the balance of the treaty, in articles not touched by reservations, we find ample provisions requiring the United States to do all in the direction of seeking to adjust controversies and prevent wars by negotiations which was contained in article 10. So there is no reason why anyone who was willing to vote for the Simmons substitute, or bipartisan substitute, should not vote for this reservation.

The real substance to the reservation to article 10 is the provision that the United States shall not be obligated to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of other countries by the employment of its military or naval forces, its resources, or any form of economic discrimination, unless in any particular case Congress, in the exercise of full liberty of action, by act or joint resolution so provides.

This reservation is essential, or the United States should never enter the league. We can not pledge our boys for all time to the wars of the world. We can not even pledge future generations to furnish the money for the conduct of wars all over the world.

Article 10 carries this pledge unless the reservation is made.

CONGRESS SHOULD DECIDE EACH CASE AS IT ARISES.

It can hardly be claimed that under our Constitution it was ever contemplated that such an obligation should be made. Our Constitution does not allow Congress to appropriate money for the Army and the Navy for longer than two years. Why? Because the people are to have a chance at their Representatives every two years; they are to have a chance to put somebody else in their places if they spend money for armies and navies in a way which the people do not approve. Every two years, under the spirit of our Constitution, Congress is to have the chance to stop war, to stop armies, and to stop navies by stopping the appropriations; and yet this obligation in article 10 would put upon all future Congresses, so long as we are members of the league, the duty to enter the wars of the world and to send our boys to foreign lands, whether our people approve the particular war or disapprove it.

I insist that each Congress should consider each case as it arises; I insist that the American people will never be satisfied to submit to an obligation looking forward to the future indefinitely pledging our boys to war; pledging our purse to war. I ask again, can we not trust the future? Can we not trust future Congresses? Can we not trust our descendants? If there is a real call to serve the world, if there is a real call to protect some oppressed people, must we bind future Congresses now, because otherwise we will not trust them? Will not our boys and our grandsons and granddaughters, as they assume the responsibility for government, will not the men and women of this country, as they jointly assume the responsibility of government as the years roll on, be as loyal as are we? Will they not love their fellow men the world over as much as we do? Can we not leave them to decide whether a particular case is just; whether the aggression from the outside which threatens existing territory is a righteous or an unrighteous aggression?

Suppose the Chinese became sufficiently powerful to menace the holding of Korea by Japan; under this obligation we would go there and help Japan drive the Chinamen back. Frankly, we would not do it; Congress would break the obligation before it would do it. I am unwilling to enter into an obligation of a character which, I think, Congress, on account of its repulsive nature, would break. Suppose the Chinese, who are a peaceful people, became sufficiently well trained for war and went into Korea to help the Koreans drive the Japanese out; under this obligation of article 10 we would send our boys to Korea to help keep the Japanese in control. Suppose some outside people sought to aid the Egyptians in winning their liberty; we would send our soldiers there to help keep Egypt in subjugation. Or let us go back to our own Revolution, when the French came here to help us; if the League of Nations embodying article 10, had then been in existence, every member of the league would have been obligated to come here and help Great Britain keep the United States a subject colony.

Do we propose to assume such an obligation? Does anybody believe the American people will approve it? I want to warn my associates on this side not to take that issue to the American people. They will never approve it. I have never known anything politically except to be a member of the Democratic Party, and I should dislike to see the crushing defeat that party would receive if it undertook to carry on a campaign in this country on the proposition that we insisted upon assuming all the obligations of article 10. I presume I would have to do as I did when my party declared for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1—I voted the ticket, but publicly stated that I hoped I would never live long enough to see such a heresy enacted into legislation. I am sorry my friend the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is sitting so near me. If I had thought for a moment that he was honoring me with his presence, I would not have made that statement.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, Mr. President, an honest confession is good for the soul. We had a great many of that sort of Democrats in 1896.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is all right; but I voted the ticket. When you do not like much that is in the platform and yet vote the ticket, it is standing up about as strong as a man can.

Mr. THOMAS. Taking the sacrament and repudiating the Christ does not make much of a Christian.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But, unfortunately, free silver at 16 to 1 was not the Christ.

Mr. THOMAS. No; that was the sacrament.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was the sacrament?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and the Senator took the sacrament by voting the ticket.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What was the Christ? The Senator said "repudiating the Christ."

Mr. THOMAS. Christ was the Democratic Party. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, the party—I thought the Senator meant that Bryan was the Christ when I voted the ticket.

Mr. THOMAS. No, Mr. President; I have said a great many things in my life, but I have never been accused of saying that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. KING. I wish to assure the Senator that no man is the Democratic Party, whether it is Mr. Bryan or anybody else, and that no declaration by the Democratic Party of any particular doctrine or dogma constitutes the great precepts and principles of the Democratic Party as they were enunciated by Jefferson, and, as in the main, they have been accepted and followed by the Democratic Party.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the little colloquy between the Senator from Georgia and myself was a mere pleasantry.

Mr. KING. And my contribution was a pleasantry also.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I accept the view of the Senator from Utah. I utterly deny that if the convention at San Francisco should indorse this treaty without reservations it would be sound Democratic doctrine; on the contrary, I believe it would assert a doctrine that invaded the Constitution of the United States, and that every real good Democrat ought to regret such an action.

I agree further with the Senator from Utah that no one man constitutes any party. If a party is loyal to principle, the great body of people members of the party constitute the party.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator think everybody knows more than anybody?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have frequently thought that in multitude of counsel there is wisdom, and from the lack of counsel there come blunders.

Mr. President, I will not proceed further to discuss the constitutional right to interfere with the authority of Congress in declaring war. I am disposed to believe that we could put an obligation upon the Congress, and that if we adopted article 10 without reservation we would put an obligation on Congress by which it would be bound; and that is why I can not, and will not, vote to ratify this treaty without eliminating that provision of article 10 which obligates us to preserve the territory and the government of member nations.

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE CAN BE TRUSTED.

Mr. President, I have discussed this subject longer than I had intended. I wish to urge that the reservations are not, as a rule, objectionable. The majority of them are wise and necessary. I may differ from their language; I may feel that here and there a change should be made, but in a matter of this sort no one man can have his way. If we are going to legislate as a whole, the legislation must be made up of mutual concession. The question is, taking the reservations all together, Shall we ratify the treaty or shall we decline to ratify it? Shall we leave our country at war indefinitely? Shall we take no part in adjusting the strife in Europe? Shall we undertake to throw this whole question into a political contest and allow it to continue to interfere with our important domestic problems?

Mr. President, let me say again, with regard to the reservation which has caused so much dispute, that we ought not to undertake to fasten the burden of war upon future generations. We can leave to them the privilege of determining what should be done as the occasion arises. I have confidence in the American people. If the time should come when the United States is again needed to help crush a foe of the human race, to help crush a grasping, tyrannical government, which seeks to destroy the rights and absorb the territory of the other nations of the world, or even if, in a less important case, it was necessary for us to contribute to check aggression upon the weak, our people and the Congresses of the future can meet the responsibility. I am willing to trust to those who will do the voting a few years hence and to those who will represent them a few years hence to decide what should be done. I entirely resent the view that it is for us now to withdraw from future Congresses and from the people of the future the right to pass upon emergencies and responsibilities as they arise. I have confidence that the American people will always be ready to do their duty.

Article 10 would bind in chains the Congresses of the future and require them to send our boys into and spend our resources for the wars of the world, whether the cause for which they fought was deemed by them right or wrong.

When the cause is just and the call is one which should be heeded we may trust the people of our country and their descendents to do a full part. The citizens of the United States now living and unborn need no present chains to bind them to a future record as glorious as the record of the past. At this hour the American people need no declaration of obligation. They will always answer with national conduct as exalted as when we went with majestic power to the rescue of liberty on the fields of France.

This reservation only means that we would leave our people and their representatives to determine, as a crisis might arise, how we should act. We know they would be true to themselves, to the world, and to their glorious past.

Senators, we must trust the American people and their representatives in the future. We must leave it to them to decide when the sacrifice will be needed. We must not chain them with obligations now. We must trust them. They will never consent that governments of the people, by the people, and for the people may perish from the face of the earth.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the resolution of ratification is now before the Senate with reservations—

Safeguarding the right of withdrawal for the United States (sec. 1).

Forbidding the acceptance of a mandate except by act of Congress (sec. 3).

Protecting the domestic affairs of the United States from interference (sec. 4).

Safeguarding the Monroe doctrine (sec. 5).

Reserving full liberty of action as to Shantung (sec. 6).

Forbidding persons to represent the United States under the peace treaty except by authority of Congress (sec. 7).

Withholding assent to any interference in the business between Germany and the United States by the reparation commission, except with the approval of Congress (sec. 8).

Forbidding expenses to be incurred without the previous consent of Congress (sec. 9).

That the limitation of armaments is subject to congressional action (sec. 10).

Reserving the right to permit foreign citizens under article 16 to do business in the United States (sec. 11).

Protecting the rights of the citizens of the United States in Germany (sec. 12).

Withholding assent to the labor provisions of the treaty unless Congress acts (sec. 13).

Withholding assent to decisions of the council or assembly unless the United States be given six votes, or a vote equal to any other country (sec. 14).

Expressing sympathy for Ireland (sec. 15).

There is no great harm in any of them. There is, perhaps, advantage in some of them.

There is considerable partisan politics in some of them; but, on the whole, they will meet the fears of many who have been led to believe that without such reservations our interests might possibly be interfered with or injured.

The only reservation of great controversy is No. 2, relating to article 10, which is as follows:

The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country by the employment of its military or naval forces, its resources, or any form of economic discrimination, or to interfere in any way in controversies between nations, including all controversies relating to territorial integrity or political independence, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States, under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall, in the exercise of full liberty of action, by act or joint resolution so provide.

On this reservation the Senate gave its approval by a two-thirds vote—54 to 26. All of the Republicans and half of the Democrats voted for it.

Besides this, at least 11 Senators, known to favor this reservation, did not vote, making 65 Senators who are known to favor it, more than two-thirds of the entire Senate. And there are over 80 Senators who are known to be willing to ratify the covenant with reservations, but who decline to reconcile their differences and permit the enemies of the treaty to defeat it by joining with Democratic Senators who refuse the Lodge reservations.

The opinion of the Senate, speaking through a more than two-thirds vote, is entitled to respect.

Mr. President, the Senate of the United States under the Constitution of the United States is, jointly with the President, the treaty-making power, established by the people of the United States.

The Constitution in fixing the powers of the President declares:

He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

In the interpretation of the Constitution Presidents Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, Grant and various of his successors sought the advice of the Senate in pursuance of the Constitution before framing treaties. In the case of the pending treaty the advice of the Senate was not sought or invited. But the instrument has been framed with the advice and under the powerful influence of various foreign diplomatic representatives, representing Great Britain, France, Italy, and other countries, without the Senate being permitted to participate in the framing or in advising the President in the framing of the most important treaty ever drawn in the history of the world.

I thought it was well drawn considering the very great difficulties under which it was framed, and I was, and am now, willing to give my assent to it, and certainly during its formation without being invited I presumed to volunteer advice on numerous occasions in the hope of being of service. Some of the friendly counsel might have served a useful purpose if it had been accepted.

I advised the President not to ignore the Senate in framing the peace treaty. I advised him to invite with him representative Senators. I advised him to keep the Senate fully advised of the steps taken at Paris through the State Department. I do not mention these things in criticism of the President but merely to put in the RECORD the truth that I did what I could as his friend and associate to safeguard the President from the complications which I thought might ensue.

The President had a task of enormous difficulty, which I keenly realized, and I believe he went to the limit of his powers and of his understanding to serve the people of the United States and the people of the world in framing this great treaty.

If the treaty prove not to have been perfect, it should be remembered that the influences and the powers which the President had to meet in a foreign land were very powerful.

I think, however, that the opinion of 65 United States Senators, representing the various States of the Union, is now entitled to the respect of the President, and that he should not weigh lightly or contemptuously their expressions of opinion as recorded in their votes.

The President, in his letter to Senator HITCHCOCK on March 8, 1920, said:

I have been struck by the fact that practically every so-called reservation was in effect a rather sweeping nullification of the terms of the treaty itself. I hear of reservationists and mild reservationists, but I can not understand the difference between a nullifier and a mild nullifier.

Every Senator comes under the sweeping condemnation of the President of the United States, because every single Senator, without exception as far as I know, has voted for reservation after reservation.

And here let me pause a moment to point out the astounding similarity of the Republican and Democratic reservation to article 10, over which an irreconcilable partisan conflict has been waged. Here is the so-called Lodge reservation:

The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country by the employment of its military or naval forces, its resources, or any form of economic discrimination, or to interfere in any way in controversies between nations, including all controversies relating to territorial integrity or political independence, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States, under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall, in the exercise of full liberty of action, by act or joint resolution so provide.

And what does the reservation for which all the Democrats voted provide? This is the Simmons resolution:

The United States agrees to use its friendly offices, when requested so to do, under the provisions of article 10, in assisting to procure a just and peaceful settlement of territorial or political controversies between nations, or to protect any member of the league from external aggression—

We have that right, anyway. We do not have to put that in the treaty. That is an international right. That is the international law. But, now, listen to the balance of the Democratic reservation, if you please—but it does not assume any obligation to use its military or naval forces or its financial or economic resources for the purpose of intervention in the controversies or conflicts between nations, or to protect the territorial integrity or political independence of any nation under the provisions of article 10, unless in any particular case the Congress, in the exercise of full liberty of action, and in the light of full information as to the national justice and human right involved, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

This language is identical in meaning with the Lodge reservation. The omission of the phrases of the Lodge reservation, to wit—or to employ the military or naval forces, under any article of the treaty for any purpose—which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States—

And—

does not change the meaning except in the mind of an expert metaphysician and skilled wrangler. As far as article 10 is concerned the Simmons reservation, for which all the Democrats stood, is the same as the Lodge reservation.

I say that the difference between those reservations is nothing. It is a case of tweedledum and tweedledee, unworthy of the respect of the country; and to tell me that I should be called on, as a matter of party loyalty, to defeat this treaty because of the difference between the Simmons reservation and the Lodge reservation, I denounce as unmitigated nonsense. I will not stultify myself by pretending that there is any substantial difference. There is none; and yet this RECORD is here showing that the Democrats voted for the Simmons reservation, and wish to make a great distinction about it. The differences are negligible.

The Simmons reservation was disposed of by a motion to lay on the table by Mr. LODGE, by the following vote:

The result was announced—yeas, 45, nays 34, as follows:

So reservation No. 2, reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, was concurred in.

Mr. President, if the treaty is ratified and the President approves it, it will throw the weight of the United States on the side of the covenant of the league with all its many safeguards for the conservation of peace.

The covenant of the league provides—

Every conceivable means for preserving the peace of the world,

Such as settling disputes by conference and by diplomacy;

By conciliation;

By arbitration;

By an international high court;

By the council;

By the assembly;

By public opinion;

By delay;

By the pledge to respect each other's territorial integrity and political independence;

By the pledge to preserve each other's territorial integrity and existing political independence from external aggression;

By the avoidance of secret treaties;

By disarmament;

By the control of war supplies;

By an embargo on and blockade of an outlaw nation;

By using the military and naval forces against an outlaw nation, if such a nation should by any conceivable possibility appear;

By the prescription under unanimous consent of the reasonable rules governing international relations; and

By protecting weak nations under the highest principles of humanity and justice.

All the nations of the world have agreed to these principles except the United States.

I pointed out the only alleged important difference between Senators on the one side and on the other side, and these differences are negligible.

Venezuela has not as yet come in.

Mr. KING. Venezuela has come in now.

Mr. OWEN. I am informed that Venezuela has come in. That leaves only the Teutonic allies, who are not permitted to come in, and who are anxious to come in, and poor, distracted Russia.

The one great outstanding factor of the war is the overthrow of monarchy—the rule by divine right—the overthrow of military dynasties. The Hohenzollerns, the Hapsburgs, the Romanoffs have followed the Bourbons to complete ruin and decay. The principles of the American Declaration of Independence are now recognized throughout the world that all men—

Are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.

That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and to institute new government.

This process is going on in Russia, in Germany, in Austria, in Bulgaria, and Turkey, and it would arise in other countries under the conditions which provoked the destruction of the Governments under the Hohenzollerns, the Hapsburgs, the Romanoffs.

All the nations of the world, moreover, have agreed to the covenant of the league and pledged themselves—

To promote international cooperation.

To achieve international peace and security by their acceptance of obligations not to resort to war.

By the prescription of open, just, and honorable relations among nations.

By the firm establishment of the understandings of international law as the actual rule of conduct among Governments.

And by the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organized peoples with one another.

It was and is the noblest dream of all mankind; it has been actually established and it awaits the entry of the United States. The United States will in due time enter and will do its honest part faithfully and truly, either with or without article 10; either with or without the reservations to article 10.

I sympathize with the Democratic Senators who desire to retain by implication the obligation to preserve jointly with all the nations of the world the territorial integrity and political independence of each; but whether it is retained or not the moral obligation remains from the acceptance of the covenant as a whole, and Congress, representing the ideals of the American people, can be relied on to do its full part whenever the occasion arises, if it ever should arise. I do not believe that it ever will arise when the covenant has been established. No nation in the world, no people in the world, would be willing to commit the wanton, desperate act of violating article 10 in the face of the united peoples of the earth. That is the value of article 10, because it strengthens the conviction of the impossibility of any nation defying the military, naval, and economic forces of the whole earth.

I approve article 10 as it is. I want the United States to enter this covenant on terms of full equality, prepared to do its full duty and not being afraid of the common honesty and common sense of the representatives who will meet around the assembly table or the council table at Geneva.

I sympathize with Senators who fear article 10 on the ground that it would preserve the right of member nations to control subject nations and deny subject nations like Egypt, Ireland, Korea, and Porto Rico any future escape from tyranny. But I do not agree with them that the remedy is to reject the treaty.

The seeds of liberty and the fundamental self-evident truths embedded in the souls of men which were declared in the Declaration of Independence July 4, 1776, have grown into a world force under whose protection the nations of the earth may find peace, security, and prosperity. The confessed or belligerent autocracies of the world are humbled to the dust. The great autocracies of Russia, Prussia, Austria, and France, who in 1822 pledged themselves by the treaty of Verona to destroy the democracies of earth, have been utterly destroyed. France has become a great Republic. Russia has swung from monarchy to Bolshevism and will react into a democracy. Germany and Austria are setting up democracies, and the Catholic Church, at that time the friend of autocracies, has recently declared through His Holiness the Pope that in future the just powers of government would be regarded as coming from the people.

So that we have the sanction of all of the democracies of the world, and we have the sanction of the Catholic Church behind the democracies of the world; and it is a great addition to the powers of democracy in the world.

Great Britain, which in 1776 was in charge of Tory forces, against whom the indictment of the Declaration of Independence was drawn, has gone through a great change. Liberty and justice have steadily grown in Great Britain, have grown into a force controlling public opinion. Such noble, progressive, democratic Commonwealths as New Zealand, Australia, South Africa, Canada, have grown up; England itself presents such progressive leadership as that of Asquith and Lloyd-George.

I realize perfectly well that in the foreign office of Great Britain there are many men of Tory tendencies, trained for diplomatic careers, who think in terms of imperialism, always pleading that it is better for the subject people that the English foreign office govern them. I realize that under such management the Irish people have been grievously oppressed; that the people of Egypt have been denied their just liberties; but, Mr. President, the education of mankind proceeds slowly, and with the establishment of the covenant of the league and the meeting of the assembly, and the meeting of the council, representing a spirit of progressive democracy, which is moving the whole world, I can not doubt that the same principles which are written in the covenant of the league in article 22, providing for mandatories, will develop into complete liberty for all the subject nations in the world as rapidly as they can be taught to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world.

Article 22 declares—

That the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization, and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in this covenant.

It provides for freedom of conscience, freedom of religion, prohibition of slavery, prohibition of liquor traffic, and requires an annual report to the assembly to be made by the mandatories who undertake to develop the weaker peoples of earth.

Mr. President, democratic self-government by the peoples of the world is the outgrowth of the printing press, the modern newspaper, the modern magazine, of the free schools, and of the realization of men that compulsory education is essential to self-government. When we speak of the right of self-determination we do not speak of the right of uninformed savages to organize a modern democracy. They have no capacity. What we do mean is that as rapidly as people develop the intelligence necessary for self-government they should have the right to govern themselves when such governments are justified on the standards fixed by existing nations.

I have no doubt that democracy under this covenant of the league has established itself forever upon the earth, because all of the factors which have developed modern democracy not only remain but are growing like the green bay tree, increasing from year to year, and the elements of opposition to the growth of democratic government have been largely destroyed.

I am not willing to postpone the ratification of the peace treaty for many other reasons.

First. The people of the United States have a right to the repeal of all the war statutes, which automatically end only after the declaration of peace. These statutes are numerous. I attach to my remarks, without reading, an abstract of them, including the war powers of controlling food and fuel; the war powers to commandeer the railroads, telegraph, and telephones; the war powers to interfere with business by embargoes of all kinds and priority orders; the war powers to expand the Army and Navy; the espionage act, with its spies all over the country; the right to arrest men and imprison them and hold them without trial under war powers; the right to confiscate property and commandeer goods. I ask leave to have them inserted in the RECORD at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. OWEN. All of these statutes ought to terminate. We ought to have our peace.

If the world is not to have peace and disarmament, our taxes must double in the competitive race of preparedness for the next war. We must have universal military training if we are not to have world peace.

The United States should, with great resolution, address itself to the reconstruction problems which are urgent and pressing. I know the anxiety of the people of the country to find the means of adjusting themselves to the increased cost of living. I sympathize with the fathers and mothers who are distressed in finding the means to give proper clothing and food and shelter and education to their children and to properly provide themselves with the necessities of life. I know what the factors are that have caused the high cost of living, and I know that very much can be done to relieve the distress of the people over the high cost of living.

On the 7th of last August, I introduced Senate resolution 159 providing for a committee from this body to study the high cost of living and to report the means by which it should be dealt with. I ask leave to insert that resolution in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, That the President of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint from the membership of this Senate a select committee of five Members, for the Sixty-sixth Congress, and which said committee is hereby authorized to fully investigate the high cost of living; and, in addition to the powers herein conferred, shall have the same powers and authority as are now conferred by the rules of the Senate upon the standing committees of the Senate. Said committee is hereby authorized to employ counsel, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths and affirmations, to take testimony, to employ stenographers at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee or its subcommittees, to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during any recess which may occur during its sessions, and may meet at such places as said committee deems advisable. Said committee is also hereby authorized and empowered to appoint such subcommittees as it may deem advisable, and such subcommittees, when so appointed, are hereby authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths and take testimony, and to meet at such times and places as said committee shall from time to time direct; further

"Resolved, That said select committee shall report to the Senate in one or more reports, as it may deem advisable, the result of its investigations, with such recommendations as it may care to make; further

"Resolved, That the President of the Senate is hereby authorized to issue subpœnas to witnesses, upon the request of said committee or any subcommittee thereof, during any recess of Congress during the sessions; further

"Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate be directed to serve all subpœnas and other process put into his hands by said committee or any subcommittee thereof."

Mr. OWEN. I introduced the resolution in the hope that the Senate would address itself to this duty. Nothing whatever has been done to relieve the condition. Six months have passed by, with endless debate on the treaty, and now we are invited to throw this treaty into the next campaign, where it will be discussed on a thousand rostrums and the attention of the people diverted as if by a smoke screen from the real obstacles to their peace and happiness, the monopolies and the profiteers of this, our great country.

It is of the most extreme importance to stimulate production in the United States, and our great industrial enterprises can be wonderfully stimulated by proper governmental action. They can be served and can be made to serve the people as greatly as the banks of the country were taught how to serve the people of this country by the Federal reserve act, to the benefit both of the country and of the banks themselves.

I am not willing to have the treaty of peace postponed, not only for the sake of America but for the sake of the world, because the reconstruction of Europe makes it of supreme consequence that our moral force and our available convenient resources should be employed in helping to put Europe upon a productive basis, so necessary for the happiness of Europe and for our own welfare, so necessary to stop the terrible social unrest of Europe which is threatening the civilization of the world with the madness of Bolshevism.

They owe our Government and our people now nearly $14,000,000,000 which would greatly lower our taxes if this money were paid back. We can help them pay back by helping restore the peace of the world so their soldiers can go to work.

Mr. President, on the 5th of February last I took occasion to present to my State the wonderful accomplishments of the Democratic Party of the last seven years. (Cong. Rec. Feb. 27, 1920.) The cap sheaf was the German peace treaty and the covenant of the League of Nations. I will not give my approval to the defeat of this covenant. I will not promote an anticlimax, and I am not willing to defend a course of conduct which I think is indefensible. I do not believe there is a single Democratic Senator who would not vote for this resolution of ratification if it were not for the belief of such Senators that the President of the United States desires them to defeat the resolution of ratification now pending and would regard their failure to do so as a refusal to follow his view as party leader.

For many years I have strenuously devoted myself to the service of the country and to the service of the Democratic Party. But it is not to the interest of the country; it is not to the interest of the Democratic Pary to defeat this ratification. I am convinced that the people of my State overwhelmingly desire ratification, and that they will be content with the reservations that two-thirds of the Senate insists upon. I am satisfied that the people of the United States desire the ratification of the treaty with the reservations desired by two-thirds of the Senate, and I am satisfied that the Democrats of the country will overwhelmingly approve the ratification now without delay, notwithstanding the reservations, which after all do not very greatly impair the force of the covenant.

Mr. President, I am told it will be to the advantage of the Democratic Party to join in with the enemies of this treaty and defeat it. Mr. President, if the present interest of the Democratic Party were at stake I would not sacrifice the interests of the people of this country in order to gain an unjust party advantage. As an American Senator, mindful of my duty to the Senate and to the Constitution of the United States, deeply conscious of my duty to the people of our beloved country, I shall vote for the resolution of ratification and for immediate peace.

Those who advise the defeat of the resolution may take their own responsibilities.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of ratification as amended.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LODGE. The yeas and nays must be called on a two-thirds vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays will necessarily be called. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. CUMMINS's name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], who is unavoidably absent. If he were present, he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. GERRY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea." If present, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] would vote "nay." That Senator is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. HARDING's name was called). I have been requested to announce that the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], in order to facilitate a vote on this question, agreed to pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is absent on account of illness. If at liberty to vote, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] would vote "yea" and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] would vote "nay."

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] joins with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] in pairing with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] on this question. Were the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico (when his name was called). I received a telegram to-day from the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], who is absent on business of the Senate, requesting that I join with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] in forming a pair with him upon this question. As has already been announced, if the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] were present, he would vote "nay." If not paired and at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. Through an understanding reached with that Senator before he left the city I am at liberty to vote on this question. I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. McNARY (when Mr. McCUMBER's name was called). The senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] is absent on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. If present, the Senator from North Dakota would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. NEWBERRY's name was called). The Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] have paired on this question with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. If the Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] were present, he would vote "yea," the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] would vote "yea," and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] would vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). The announcement made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] regarding my regular pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] leaves me at liberty to vote. I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], which pair I made in order to accommodate him. If he were present, the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] would vote "nay." If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], but, in addition to the fact that it would require a double pair upon this particular vote, I am informed that that Senator, if present, would vote as I am about to vote. For these two reasons I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, it resulted—yeas 49, nays 35, as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon agreeing to the resolution of ratification the yeas are 49 and the nays are 35. Not having received the affirmative votes of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting, the resolution is not agreed to, and the Senate does not advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The resolution of ratification voted upon and rejected is as follows:

Resolution of ratification.

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, subject to the following reservations and understandings, which are hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted as a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by the allied and associated powers and a failure on the part of the allied and associated powers to make objection to said reservations and understandings prior to the deposit of ratification by the United States shall be taken as a full and final acceptance of such reservations and understandings by said powers:

1. The United States so understands and construes article 1 that in case of notice of withdrawal from the League of Nations, as provided in said article, the United States shall be the sole judge as to whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under the said covenant have been fulfilled, and notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

2. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country by the employment of its military or naval forces, its resources, or any form of economic discrimination, or to interfere in any way in controversies between nations, including all controversies relating to territorial integrity or political independence, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States, under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall, in the exercise of full liberty of action, by act or joint resolution so provide.

3. No mandate shall be accepted by the United States under article 22, part 1, or any other provision of the treaty of peace with Germany, except by action of the Congress of the United States.

4. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children and in opium and other dangerous drugs, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the League of Nations, or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

5. The United States will not submit to arbitration or to inquiry by the assembly or by the council of the League of Nations, provided for in said treaty of peace, any questions which in the judgment of the United States depend upon or relate to its long-established policy, commonly known as the Monroe doctrine; said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said League of Nations and entirely unaffected by any provision contained in the said treaty of peace with Germany.

6. The United States withholds its assent to articles 156, 157, and 158, and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy which may arise under said articles.

7. No person is or shall be authorized to represent the United States, nor shall any citizen of the United States be eligible, as a member of any body or agency established or authorized by said treaty of peace with Germany, except pursuant to an act of the Congress of the United States providing for his appointment and defining his powers and duties.

8. The United States understands that the reparation commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States, only when the United States by act or joint resolution of Congress approves such regulation or interference.

9. The United States shall not be obligated to contribute to any expenses of the League of Nations, or of the secretariat, or of any commission, or committee, or conference, or other agency, organized under the League of Nations or under the treaty or for the purpose of carrying out the treaty provisions, unless and until an appropriation of funds available for such expenses shall have been made by the Congress of the United States: Provided, That the foregoing limitation shall not apply to the United States proportionate share of the expense of the office force and salary of the secretary general.

10. No plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the council of the League of Nations under the provisions of article 8 shall be held as binding the United States until the same shall have been accepted by Congress, and the United States reserves the right to increase its armament without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

11. The United States reserves the right to permit, in its discretion, the nationals of a covenant-breaking State, as defined in article 16 of the covenant of the League of Nations, residing within the United States or in countries other than such covenant-breaking State, to continue their commercial, financial, and personal relations with the nationals of the United States.

12. Nothing in articles 296, 297, or in any of the annexes thereto or in any other article, section, or annex of the treaty of peace with Germany shall, as against citizens of the United States, be taken to mean any confirmation, ratification, or approval of any act otherwise illegal or in contravention of the rights of citizens of the United States.

13. The United States withholds its assent to Part XIII (articles 387 to 427, inclusive) unless Congress by act or joint resolution shall hereafter make provision for representation in the organization established by said Part XIII, and in such event the participation of the United States will be governed and conditioned by the provisions of such act or joint resolution.

14. Until Part I, being the covenant of the League of Nations, shall be so amended as to provide that the United States shall be entitled to cast a number of votes equal to that which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate shall be entitled to cast, the United States assumes no obligation to be bound, except in cases where Congress has previously given its consent, by any election, decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate have cast more than one vote.

The United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly arising out of any dispute between the United States and any member of the league if such member, or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire united with it politically has voted.

15. In consenting to the ratification of the treaty with Germany the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination and to the resolution of sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice adopted by the Senate June 6, 1919, and declares that when such government is attained by Ireland, a consummation it is hoped is at hand, it should promptly be admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution, which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be instructed to return to the President the treaty of peace with Germany, signed at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, and respectfully inform the President that the Senate has failed to ratify said treaty, being unable to obtain the constitutional majority therefor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to inquire whether this is a debatable matter?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the question is debatable.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hope the consideration of the resolution may be deferred for a little more mature consideration. So long as the treaty remains in the Senate there is a possibility of action upon it. When we send it to the White House that possibility is probably at an end. Under those circumstances why not take a day or two in which to consider the matter? Why so precipitately act upon it at this time?

It seems to me that the sincere friends of ratification of a real treaty, those who sincerely desire to make the last effort to bring together the presidential mind and the mind of the Senate, ought to be willing to defer action upon the matter at this time.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have offered this resolution, which has been the customary resolution in most cases where a treaty has been rejected by the Senate, because it seemed to me that after a year devoted to the discussion of the treaty and after the Senate had twice refused by more than a one-third vote to advise and consent to its ratification, the time had come to end it. The hope that we can again take the treaty up and discuss it in the present Senate is a vain one, and we have no right to bring it again before the Senate and interfere with all the public business of the country for another two months. Personally I have gone as far as I think I am justified in going in the effort to get the treaty ratified. I think, in justice to the country and the business of the country and our public duty, we should officially inform the President of the action of the Senate.

In the first instance I did not present the resolution but withheld it, but I think to keep it here a day or two longer, drag it on and precipitate further debate, would be simply a failure to perform our duty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it is possible that the motion as made by the Senator from Massachusetts may be adopted with practical unanimity. What I am asking now is that it may be deferred until to-morrow. It is not important to take the action to-night.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the President of the United States, having performed his constitutional duty, having negotiated the treaty and having sent it to the Senate, and the Senate having performed its constitutional duty, having considered the treaty and having rejected it, ordinary courtesy and comity between one branch of the Government and another demand upon this occasion, as was demanded upon the former occasion when the treaty was rejected, but when we did not pursue the ordinary course of courtesy and comity, that the President should be advised of the result of the action of this body, being the other body designated by the Constitution to deal with treaty matters. I therefore hope that the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts will carry. I do not see how else we can be courteous to a coordinate branch of the Government charged with an equal duty.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish to modify the resolution so that it shall read "has failed to advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty" instead of saying "has failed to ratify."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be modified accordingly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska will state it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The rules of the Senate provide that a Senate resolution shall lie over one day on objection. Does that apply to this resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to interrupt, I have looked at all the cases of the ratification of treaties and in every instance where such a resolution was passed—and I think they have been passed in all but one or two cases—it was passed immediately after the vote and as a part of the proceedings.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I dare say that might be done unanimously, but in case of an objection it seems to me that Rule XIV of the Senate applies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion, unless otherwise informed by some precedent, that the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is so connected with the German treaty and its disposition by the Senate that it is in order at this time.

Mr. LODGE. It is part of the res gestae.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask that the resolution may be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again state the resolution.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be instructed to return to the President the treaty of peace with Germany signed at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, and respectfully inform the President that the Senate has failed to advise and consent to the ratification of the said treaty, being unable to obtain the constitutional majority therefor.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I cite the Chair to the last paragraph of Rule XIV, which reads as follows:

All resolutions shall lie over one day for consideration, unless by unanimous consent the Senate shall otherwise direct.

I object to the consideration of this resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the resolution is in order.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I wish to say just one word.

I shall support this motion, because it is very evident that this treaty can not be ratified with these reservations until such time as the President of the United States gives his consent to Senators upon the other side that they may vote so to ratify. That being true, and the President having the authority to resubmit the treaty at any time, it had better be sent there, and when the President is willing to have his followers vote to ratify it he can resubmit it to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. As he is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I understand that my pair, the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], if present would vote "yea" on this question. Conceiving myself under the circumstances to be at liberty to vote, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is unavoidably absent, and is paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. GLASS (after having voted in the negative). I rise to inquire if the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with the Senator from Illinois, and therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 47, nays 37, as follows:

advising and consenting to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. WATSON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], and I am not able to obtain a transfer. Therefore I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 43, as follows:

So the Senate refused to lay on the table Mr. ROBINSON's motion to reconsider.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], which I transfer to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. GERRY (when Mr. UNDERWOOD's name was called). The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is necessarily absent from the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GLASS. I desire to inquire whether the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not voted.

Mr. GLASS. I withhold my vote, being paired with that Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. I again announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 42, as follows:

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I make a point of order on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that the Senate having returned the treaty to the President, a motion to reconsider the action by which it was rejected is not in order, under the precedents of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, plainly, under the law of the Senate and parliamentary usage, the motion to reconsider which I made, namely, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate refused to agree to the resolution of ratification, is in order, and was in order at the time it was made. Under the precedents, the effect of this motion will be to abate action on the resolution that has been agreed to, directing the Secretary of the Senate to notify the President that the resolution of ratification was rejected, until after the motion to reconsider has been disposed of. I have not the precedents at hand, but I recall from memory that that has been the practice of the Senate. A motion to reconsider within the time fixed by the rules of the Senate can not be precluded by the resolution adopted at the instance of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] so long as the treaty itself is actually in the custody of the Senate, which is the fact in this case.

Two days are given by the rule in which to make a motion to reconsider, and while the treaty is yet in the actual possession of the Senate it is not necessary to request the President to return the treaty. A motion to reconsider is plainly in order.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to present for the consideration of the Chair the second subdivision or clause of Rule XIII dealing with the subject of reconsideration. Of course, the final vote having been taken in the Senate upon a bill, it goes out of the possession of the Senate automatically and goes to the House; but that does not by any means prevent a motion to reconsider. That is taken care of by subdivision 2 of Rule XIII, namely:

> When a bill, resolution, report, amendment, order, or message, upon which a vote has been taken, shall have gone out of the possession of the Senate and been communicated to the House of Representatives, the motion to reconsider shall be accompanied by a motion to request the House to return the same, which last motion shall be acted upon immediately, and without debate, and if determined in the negative shall be a final disposition of the motion to reconsider.

So by a like course of reasoning, even if the resolution had been acted upon and the treaty had actually gone out of the possession of the Senate, a motion to reconsider could still be made, and by parity of reasoning it might be accompanied by a motion to return the treaty to the Senate. Obviously, the fact that the papers have gone out of the possession of the Senate does not cut off the right to reconsider within the two days' limit fixed by the rule, nor can the right to reconsider thus accorded by the rule be cut off by a resolution which passes the papers beyond the control of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, it seems to me that the present situation is not at all analogous to that which arises when action is had upon a bill. The bill is still here, and a motion to consider, then, under the rule can be made within two days. In the present situation we have acted upon a treaty, and having rejected the treaty the Senate has voted to notify the President that the treaty has been rejected, and the matter is no longer before the Senate. The President is notified, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has stated, that the Senate has performed its constitutional duty in the premises.

The treaty is constructively out of the possession of the Senate, of course. To move to reconsider something that is not here at all, and even the resolution to agree to which has been defeated, when the Senate has notified the President of that fact, in my opinion is clearly out of order, and I make the point of order against it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator has quoted me, which permits me, I suppose, to interrupt him. I am of the opinion that when the President has performed his constitutional function and the Senate has performed its constitutional function, that ends the thing, and the treaty must go back to the President as a matter of comity and ordinary politeness; but when the matter is still subject to a motion to reconsider, if it is subject to that motion—I have not yet heard the ruling of the Chair—then, of course, the Senate has not fully performed its constitutional function until the motion to reconsider has been voted upon.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator has stated right over again what I thought I had stated. Of course, it is subject to reconsideration if it is subject to reconsideration. The question is, Is it? I claim that it is not, because it is not here. The Senate has performed its constitutional duty in the premises and has rejected the treaty, and has so notified the President. It has done all that it can. Under those circumstances the rule which would be applicable to an ordinary bill within two days after it was acted upon does not apply, in my opinion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator says the treaty is not here. The mere fact that the Senate has passed a resolution to send the treaty back to the President has not deprived the Senate of the possession of the treaty, because the possession by the Senate of the treaty depends upon the motion to reconsider. As an absolute bodily fact, the Senate is still in the possession of the treaty until the motion to reconsider has been disposed of.

I do not see any particular sense or use in much of this, but we must pursue the ordinary course of conduct as a parliamentary body. Every parliamentary body has a right to reconsider a resolution which it has previously made, and the motion to reconsider has of a right itself to be considered and to be decided upon by the Senate. Until the Senate does decide not to reconsider and until the treaty has been bodily conveyed to the White House, it is still here, subject to the action of the Senate. Although I will have no vote upon the proposition, because I am paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and while this, I imagine, is perhaps not a part of the resolution of ratification, it seems to me that ordinary fairness and ordinary courtesy suggest that the Senate shall vote upon the motion to reconsider before it deprives itself of the possession of the document.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, further with respect to the point of order, I point out that the right to move a reconsideration is not confined to the ordinary legislative work of the Senate, but embraces any question decided by the Senate. The language of the rule governing the subject is as broad as it can well be. The language is as follows:

> When a question has been decided by the Senate, any Senator voting with the prevailing side may, on the same day or on either of the next two days of actual session thereafter, move a reconsideration.

It is undoubtedly true that this language embraces a vote on a resolution of ratification. The phrase, "when a question has been decided by the Senate," involves every subject matter upon which the Senate may pass by a vote of its Members. There is no exception stated and no exception is implied.

Clearly, then, the motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution advising and consenting to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany was not agreed to is in order at any time within two days of actual session after the vote was taken.

Mr. CURTIS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I might state that that question was raised in reference to confirmation when by vote of the Senate it was decided that if the papers were out of the hands of the Senate the motion was out of order, even though made within two days. It seems to me the real question in this case is whether or not the motion to notify the President took the papers out of the hands of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Now, the Senator by his statement has anticipated the exact point that I was coming to. The second clause of the rule is:

> When a bill, resolution, report, amendment, order, or message, upon which a vote has been taken, shall have gone out of the possession of the Senate and been communicated to the House of Representatives, the motion to reconsider shall be accompanied by a motion to request the House to return the same.

While that rule does not apply expressly to treaties and to such a resolution as the Senate adopted upon the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], by clear implication, since the motion to reconsider applies to the vote on the resolution of ratification and may be made at any time within two days, it should be accompanied with a request to the President to return the papers if the papers have actually gone out of the Senate. But that is not the case here. While the resolution instructing the Secretary of the Senate to return the papers to the President has passed the Senate, the papers are still within the actual possession of the Senate and it is not necessary to accompany my motion for reconsideration with the request that the papers shall be returned by the President.

I will state that if the Chair should take the view of the matter that notwithstanding the fact that the treaty is lying there on the desk and is still in the actual possession of the Senate, it is constructively at the White House, I will accompany my motion for a reconsideration with a request that the President return it to the Senate, where it is now in fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make that motion?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I do not care to make that motion unless the Chair holds that the motion which I have already made is not in order, in which case I will ask the privilege to present the other motion. I think the motion I have made is clearly in order for the reasons already stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes that the question is one upon which there may be fair differences of opinion, and any ruling that he makes he will assume that it is simply a prelude to the determination of the matter in another way.

If the relation between the President of the United States and the Senate were the same as the relation between the Senate and the House of Representatives, so that the rule cited by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] applies to the case in hand, the Chair would have no doubt whatever. But the Chair feels that the relation between the Senate and the President is not the same as the relation between the House and the Senate.

If the German treaty had passed physically out of the possession of the Senate and was in the hands of the President, under the resolution which has been adopted by the Senate, the Chair would feel no doubt whatever that it would be beyond the power of the Senate to recall the German treaty from the President. It would be entirely within the discretion of the President as to whether he would put the Senate again in possession of the treaty.

The Chair is therefore inclined to believe that the rule which has been cited by the Senator from Arkansas does not apply, and while the Chair renders the decision with some doubt in his own mind, the Chair is inclined to hold that the motion is not in order and therefore sustains the point of order made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE].

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think all this controversy has arisen from the desire of some Senators to have a second vote on the question of ratifying the treaty. If that is what is desired by any Senators here, I shall make no objection to a motion to reconsider, if it can be understood that we may take the vote without debate. I should like, if possible, to finish this business to-night. There are many Senators to whom it is the utmost inconvenience to remain here and who have remained at great personal inconvenience. There has been a decisive vote on the main question; but I am perfectly willing to have it repeated; and I ask unanimous consent that the vote be reconsidered and that another vote be taken without further debate upon the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It seems to be necessary to take several votes on this matter every time it comes up. I have no objection whatever, if Senators who have gone home, thinking that having rejected the treaty again it was really rejected, may be covered, but my colleague [Mr. MCLEAN] has gone home, and, although he did not vote on the same side of the question that I did, I think he ought to be entitled to his pair, as should any other Senators who have left the Chamber. If the pair clerks say that all Senators who were here and voted who do not respond upon the roll call will be covered, I have no objection whatever to taking the vote over again.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not see that there is anything to be gained by voting again immediately on what we have just voted on. My idea was that by having a motion to reconsider pending we might have a day or two to cool off in, and there might possibly be some adjustment.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Senators on the other side must be getting pretty cool.

Mr. LODGE. I think after a year of debate we might at least ask for an end of the controversy. I think the country is entitled to it; I think the Senate is entitled to it; and I think the President is entitled to it. To keep the treaty here to fool with it for a day or two more would seem to me to be futile.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course I have no objection to voting just as long as the Secretary can call the roll; but I want to know before this proposal goes any further whether or not Senators are here. Senators have gotten up and left the Chamber; two of them, I understand, have left the city; and I, of course, do not propose to have a vote under those circumstances, if I have to stay here on the floor all night. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not think the Senator need do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BORAH. I withdraw my suggestion for just a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho withdraws his suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suggest that the Senator from Idaho withdraw that time-killing motion, as I understand the Chair has ruled out of order the motion to reconsider.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That settles that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustained the point of order made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then there is nothing before the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. There is a request for unanimous consent before the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was wondering if we could not by unanimous consent arrive at a situation like this: That the motion to reconsider be allowed to be pending and that we agree to take a vote on the motion to reconsider to-morrow at 12 o'clock without debate?

Mr. McCORMICK. No, sir.

Mr. LODGE. I made an offer; I want the matter settled and settled to-night. I should like to have a vote. If Senators want to discuss it during the night, all right, but I think some of us are entitled to ask for a decision.

Mr. BORAH. I am perfectly willing to have a decision, but I am not willing to have it in the absence of Senators who have gone away on the supposition that there had been a decision reached.

Mr. LODGE. I agree to that.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, pending the request of the Senator from Massachusetts for unanimous consent, I suggest the absence of a quorum, in order to ascertain whether Senators are present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Glass	La Follette	Shields
Beckham	Gore	Lenroot	Simmons
Borah	Gronna	Lodge	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Hale	McCormick	Smith, Md.
Calder	Harris	McKellar	Smith, S. C.

Chamberlain	Henderson	Moses	Spencer
Colt	Hitchcock	Myers	Stanley
Comer	Johnson, Calif.	New	Sterling
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Sutherland

Fernald	Kenyon	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	Keyes	Pomerene	Watson
France	King	Reed	Williams
Gay	Kirby	Robinson	Wolcott
Gerry	Knox	Sheppard

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. ROBINSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the President of the United States be requested to return to the Senate the treaty of peace with Germany and that the Senate reconsider the vote by which it refused to advise and consent to the ratification of said treaty.

Mr. President, I announced when the motion to reconsider was under debate that if it were held that notwithstanding the fact that the treaty is actually in the Senate, it has constructively passed out of the possession of the Senate, I would accompany the motion to reconsider with a request that the President return the papers. While I have not the precedents before me, I am so morally certain that there is no precedent to the contrary that I assert that if the papers are in the actual possession of the Senate it is not necessary to accompany the motion to reconsider with a request for their return; but since it has been held that the papers, while actually in the possession of the Senate, are at the White House, I modify my motion, and request that the President be requested to return the treaty.

There are in the precedents many cases where this course has been pursued. There is not a single case where the Senate or any presiding officer of the Senate has held that a motion to reconsider it not in order, or, if the papers have actually gone to the White House, that a motion to reconsider accompanied by a request for their return is not in order.

I know that the present occupant of the Chair does not desire to disregard the rules of the Senate; I know that he does not intend to ignore the precedents of the Senate——

Mr. LODGE. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his point of order.

Mr. LODGE. If we are to observe the precedents of the Senate, I suggest that the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to reconsider the vote by which the Secretary was directed to send the papers to the President is not in order, because the Senator from Arkansas did not vote on the prevailing side.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have made no such motion as that to which the Senator refers.

Mr. LODGE. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have again moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate refused to agree to the resolution advising and consenting to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany, and I have accompanied the motion for such reconsideration——

Mr. LODGE. Precisely——

Mr. ROBINSON. With a request that the President return to the Senate the treaty of peace. I have not made a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I make a point of order against the motion as presented by the Senator from Arkansas. A similar question arose in the case of the nomination of the Comptroller of the Currency. The Senate on the 12th day of April rejected the nomination and so notified the President. On the 14th day of April in the Senate it was moved to reconsider, but the Senate, by a unanimous vote, sustained the point of order that after the President had been notified the motion to reconsider came too late. As the Chair has well said, this is not a case like that of a bill passing this body and going to the House of Representatives.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I understand that the motion to reconsider is withdrawn. I ask unanimous consent to take another vote, if it is so desired, on the ratification resolution of the treaty, provided that all votes are covered, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, on the question of pairs, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] is absent, so I am advised; the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] is absent; and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN].

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Delaware is on the train on his way to Wilmington.

Mr. CURTIS. So with those absentees there would be two for the measure and one against it, and that could be taken care of. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is absent, as I understand. The President pro tempore, if he desires, could transfer his pair, and that would take care of the Senator from Colorado. I do not know whether there are any other absentees or not. Those are all that I have notice of.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, under the circumstances I think I shall object to unanimous consent to taking any vote to-night. If it can not be allowed to be pending, I shall object to voting to-night.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I understand that the motion to reconsider was withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

Mr. LODGE. Then I move that the Senate, as in legislative session——

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

WAR WITH GERMANY.

Mr. KNOX. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 139, repealing the joint resolution of April 6, 1917, declaring a state of war to exist between the United States and Germany.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I trust that while a request is being made, and I held the floor at the time and yielded to the Senator from Pennsylvania, the floor will not be taken away from me while I am holding it. It has been refused to me. I should like to hold it while I have it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I have the floor. The Senator from Pennsylvania——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, a point of order. The Senator from Massachusetts yielded the floor to the Senator from Pennsylvania, who made a motion.

Mr. LODGE. I did not. I yielded to the Senator simply to make a motion, which is constantly done. I did not yield the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator knows well that he can not take recognition and parcel it out to other Senators.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly aware of that, and I am not parceling it out; but I know I can yield the floor long enough to allow a Senator to make a motion or introduce a bill and not lose possession of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor. He has yielded to the Senator from Pennsylvania for the purpose of making a motion, which is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 139.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin will state it.

Mr. LENROOT. That motion is debatable, I take it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is debatable.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I wish to say with reference to this motion that I think the Senate should proceed in the very near future to take up the subject which is covered by the Senator's joint resolution. I do not think the Senate ought to vote to take it up to-night, however, and therefore I shall vote against it.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, did I understand the Chair to rule that the Senator from Massachusetts still has the floor, while the Senate is voting on this motion?

Mr. LODGE. I ask to be recognized now.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. We are about to take a vote. Do I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts holds the floor while the Senate is taking a vote?

Mr. LODGE. I am asking to be recognized. I believe I have a right to do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks for present recognition, and the Chair recognizes him. The Senator from Massachusetts.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 7 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 22, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 19, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. WALSH).

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father of our fondest hopes, our purest aspirations, our highest ideals, be with us yet to guide us as individuals and as a people to higher attainments. Theories are fine, but practice is finer. The goal of the Christian religion is brotherly love. Give us the courage, fortitude, and grace to put it into practice in our daily intercourse with our fellow men until we all come unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CLERKS TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Accounts, I present a privileged resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 413.

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce be, and is hereby, allowed a clerk at a salary at the rate of $1,500 per annum, from December 1, 1919, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise authorized by law.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the word "Resolved" and insert the following:

"That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives compensation at the rate of $150 per month during the second session of the Sixty-sixth Congress for the services of one clerk to each of the following committees: Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce, Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and Committee on Railways and Canals, said compensation to commence from the time such clerk entered upon the discharge of his duties, such time to be ascertained and evidenced by a certificate signed by the chairman of the said committee."

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the Committee on Accounts, if my memory serves me correctly, has granted but six additional clerks to committees this session. It has been customary in the past to grant 13 to 17. I have the record of the appointment of clerks to the several committees named in this resolution, numbering four, and if it is desirable I can give them. If any Member desires to propound any of the time-honored interrogatories concerning these clerks, I will yield to the chairmen of the several committees involved and they can defend their own resolutions.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question: Did these several committees have clerks during the Sixty-fifth Congress?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes, all; except during the third session.

Mr. BLANTON. What particular emergency at this time, when the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming is so arranging affairs, despite the contrary report in the Washington newspapers, for us to get away by June 5, has arisen that would necessitate the appointment of these clerks?

Mr. IRELAND. I can not go over all the testimony before the committee which the chairmen of the several committees offered, but they all assured the Committee on Accounts that they were in dire need of the services of these clerks.

Mr. BLANTON. I happened to be a member of the Committee on Railways and Canals during the Sixty-fifth Congress, and that committee had about four meetings of sufficient importance to be designated "meetings," principally on one measure. Nothing was ever done with the bill. I presume there would not be much more work in that committee during the remainder of the session than there was during the Sixty-fifth Congress. Is there any special necessity for a clerk for the Committee on Railways and Canals?

Mr. IRELAND. I think the chairman of the committee is here, and he can answer.

Mr. BLANTON. That is one of the fictitious committees, as you might say, in the House from which all, or nearly all, of its jurisdiction has been taken away and given to other committees. I think we ought to do away with the committee entirely.

Mr. IRELAND. I can heartily agree with the gentleman that perhaps half the clerks appointed to these committees serve no good purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, why do we keep appointing them? Is it because we can not turn down the claims and demands of the chairmen of these small committees? It is inconsistent with the line of procedure reported to have been adopted by the great steering committee and the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming trying to economize during the session.

Mr. IRELAND. I hope the gentleman will not confuse the important Committee on Accounts with the steering committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I suppose they are working in conjunction with each other.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not going to ask the time-honored question, but I am going to ask a new one. This resolution provides that these people begin to draw their pay from the time they begin to discharge their duties?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When do they begin?

Mr. IRELAND. I am unable to give the date as to each committee, but it has to be certified to by the chairman of the committee. I know that some of the clerks have been employed and have been going on with the work prior to the reporting of this resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did they ever begin service?

Mr. IRELAND. I have not been around to watch them, but I am told so by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When I was Speaker I undertook to resurrect this Committee on Railways and Canals, so that they would have some work to do. There are many bills that might be assigned to it. I sent for the chairman of the committee and told him I would deflect certain bills and send them to his committee if he would agree to get the committee together and go to work. He promised to do it, but he never did do it, and they have never done anything since, and I do not believe they ever will do anything. It is an absolute waste of money.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield me a minute?

Mr. IRELAND. I will yield a minute to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. During that minute I want to say that I think we ought to stop granting these numerous requests simply because they come from our colleagues, to whom we would like to grant favors, and whose requests we hate to turn down. On this resolution I am going to try to get a record vote, even if my own is the only vote against the resolution, to let it stand as a solemn protest against this kind of action of keeping on voting unnecessary clerks to useless committees.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I have not the floor.

Mr. IRELAND. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman from Texas has asked for information as to legislation pending before the Committee on Railways and Canals. Let me say to him that there is a bill (H. R. 13133) providing for a barge canal from the Altamaha River, in Georgia, to the head of the Flint River, in Georgia. There is also a bill (H. R. 10483) providing for the construction of a waterway from the Ohio River to Lake Erie. There is also a joint resolution 156, providing for a survey for a canal across the State of Florida. H. R. 10919 provides for a survey for a canal from Cumberland Sound to the mouth of the Mississippi River. Hearings will be held on this measure. H. R. 9449 provides for a canal across Florida. House resolution 201 is to ascertain the cost of transporting coal by water as compared to cost by rail.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the distinguished Republican whip yield? What is the use of calling over these various pieces of proposed legislation, when the gentleman is aware of the fact that the steering committee will probably blue pencil every one of them when it comes to a show-down.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman is conjuring up something that does not exist.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, my observation and information from inquiries made by the Committee on Appropriations into this subject of clerks to committees have disclosed the fact that we are paying out hundreds of thousands of dollars to clerks of dead or nearly dead committees. Take this Committee on Railways and Canals and several of the Committees on Elections and various committees on expenditures as examples. It is possible that at some time during the session they may need a clerk for two or three days or two or three weeks at the most. Our system of paying for these clerks for these committees annually which function only occasionally and very rarely should be stopped. If this Committee on Railways and Canals has anything to do, it has not been demonstrated since I have been a Member of Congress. It has done nothing that would warrant the employment of a clerk regularly. The Clerk of this House has a contingent fund out of which clerical help may be provided when it is temporarily needed for these committees, and I think it is about time to draw a halt upon giving clerks to every one of these committees when there is absolutely no need for them at all. [Applause.] It was demonstrated before the Committee on Appropriations that there are many other committees in similar situation. Take the Committees on Elections. Some of them never have a contest before them, and there are several of these expenditures committees which never have a meeting from the beginning of a session to the end of it. I think it is an outrage upon the Congress and an outrage upon the taxpayers of this country that this habit continues.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I came upon the floor of the House just as our distinguished ex-Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], was making his statement. I am sure the gentleman from Missouri did not intend to make an incorrect statement, and I am sure that after I call his attention to the facts of the case he will correct the part of the statement that refers to the time when I served as chairman of the Committee on Railways and Canals. I was a member of that committee for four years, when it did not have a single meeting, to my knowledge. In the regular routine of resignations I became chairman of the committee.

I came upon the floor of the House when I became chairman and told the House that I intended to make it an active committee, that I wanted the House either to give me a clerk or to abolish the committee. I did not care to act as the perfunctory chairman of a dead committee. Myself and a majority of the members of the committee waited on the Speaker of the House, Mr. CLARK, and asked him to refer bills to the committee. He promised to do so. We had bills of great importance referred to the committee. We had delegations from Chicago, from Fort Wayne, from Toledo, from Cincinnati, and from Dayton and other cities appear before us concerning the bill for a barge canal to be run through the State from Cincinnati to Toledo through the channel of the old canal. We considered another canal project, connecting Pittsburgh with Toledo, and one through Columbus, Ohio; also another canal from Defiance to Chicago. The minutes of the meetings of the committee will show that there were held possibly a dozen meetings of that committee. We had more meetings, I think, than the average committee of this House, and at almost every meeting we had foreign delegates appearing before us. After calling the Speaker's attention to these facts, I feel that he will correct his statement in justice to me. I did not seek the chairmanship of the committee; it came to me, and my position was this: I wanted to make it a working, active committee, or to have it abolished, and so stated to the House. The House gave me a clerk one session and denied me a clerk another session; but, nevertheless, we kept on with the business of the committee, and the members of the committee—and there are several of them present—will substantiate what I have said.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. How many times did this committee meet during the Sixty-fifth Congress?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. I am unable to say without referring to the minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Approximately?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Possibly 10 or 12 times.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] stated only three or four times.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I was a member of that committee during the Sixty-fifth Congress. The gentleman from Ohio, I think, is in error when he says that at each one of the meetings there were foreign delegates. I am sure I can remind the chairman of several meetings that were just perfunctory meetings, with nothing to do, and not entitled to be designated as a "committee meeting." Six or eight of us would be present in his office here in the Capitol, and besides discussing ways and means to keep the committee alive we would do nothing but adjourn; but the four meetings that I mentioned of any importance were the meetings when we had these delegates, and one of those meetings we held in the big caucus room over in the House Office Building. They were the four meetings I referred to of importance. The balance were just merely meetings to try to get the committee together and to have a committee wait on Speaker CLARK to get something referred to us to keep us from dying.

That was more the purpose of most of these little meetings, and I am sure the gentleman will admit that fact. I was a member of the special committee that went to see Speaker CLARK. The question I propounded to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. IRELAND] was after all that there was nothing accomplished, after we had all of these meetings, after we had these hearings, after we reported a bill, nothing was accomplished, and there will be nothing accomplished from this committee in this Congress.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, I feel that the gentleman having made two or three speeches on this already should let me finish my statement.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BRUMBAUGH] that possibly great good might have been accomplished in not presenting some of the bills that were insisted upon. Possibly a great deal was saved to the Treasury. It does not mean that a committee does nothing simply because it does not report some of the bills that are before it.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. We used our judgment, and the same suggestion might be made to some bills reported by the gentleman's committee. I do not suppose he claims his committee is infallible. Mr. Speaker, what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] says in a measure is true. Whenever we met we would consider a bill or arrange for something of that kind. The minutes will show, and they are open for anyone to make examination who cares to inspect them. We had several meetings at which it happened that the gentleman was not present, and at some time some other member was not present. I do not think we had many meetings when all of the members were present; but we did try to make it a working committee, and I did not care to serve as the chairman of it unless it would be a working committee. We so stated to the Speaker, and the Speaker promised to send us bills. We had several Members of the House who desired to take bills from other committees and have them referred to this committee. I have no interest in the matter, for I am no longer chairman of the committee nor am I a member of it.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. DALE].

Mr. DALE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I do not know anything about the other committees which have been discussed, but I know a little something about the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department. The first thing that impresses me in this discussion is that those who are opposed to this resolution are talking about the meetings of the committees. It has been my experience since I have been chairman of the Treasury Committee that a committee may have very few meetings but may have a very great deal of work to do.

I signed in my office yesterday afternoon in one batch 67 letters for the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and that is not an extraordinary day at all for that committee. I sign day after day 50 to 100 letters which that committee has had to write. That committee has supervision of the War Risk Bureau, and we have been investigating that bureau for weeks and for months, and while the House may think there have not been many public hearings, yet there have been a good many. We have had a hearing every day for a week or 10 days—every single day, and many before that. We had a long list of meetings. But the work of the committee does not depend upon meetings. Some of the members of that committee have to go to the War Risk Bureau and spend hours and days at a time. I have been there and spent half a day at a time day after day investigating these matters. Now, the ex-service men from all over the country are writing to that committee because of its relation to the War Risk Bureau. They are writing thousands and thousands of letters. We have probably replied to letters from that committee—say, 20,000 or 30,000 letters—coming from ex-service men. Now, when we started with the investigation in the Treasury Department we understood very well that the time was coming when that committee would be brought up here and criticized for the large amount of money that we had expended, and it would be said that we had wasted money in this investigation. We had a resolution passed through this House authorizing us to make it and employ help and employ counsel, summon witnesses, and go into the question of expenditures; but we agreed as a committee that in this investigation we would try not to spend any more money than our clerk hire amounted to. Now, we have had experts in the department; we have had men paid high prices in the bureau to make this investigation. Ever since last summer, beginning the last of July, from time to time we have had men in there investigating. Now, the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department has not spent since they began their investigation last July an amount of money equivalent to the hire of a clerk at $150 a month, and yet we have done the work, and although we have done the work, gentlemen, we have not had so much as a clerk to that committee since this House convened at the beginning of this second session. Perhaps we are not entitled to one. I do not know but that you will think we ought to pay these expenses out of our own pockets. With all the men we have had and all the days we have spent and the experts we have used the money paid out would not amount to $150 a month since we began. That is, briefly, the condition so far as the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department is concerned.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield me one minute?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BRUMBAUGH] is not the chairman I was talking about, he was not the chairman I harnessed up on it and put to work. It is true, as the gentleman from Ohio states, that he and some of his conferees on the committee did come to me and ask me to refer a bill, which I did, and a very important one was that canal—never be built, in all human probability—from Pittsburgh to the Great Lakes, and I am perfectly willing to take his statement as to what happened when he was chairman of that committee. He was not the man I was talking about.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I suppose that I might say that I am unfortunate enough to be chairman of one of these committees included in the resolution, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce. It is my idea, and has been all along, and it has been, I think, the idea of the members of the committee, to faithfully perform the work which ought to be done by that committee, and we have been trying to do that. We have not had a great many meetings, but we have had meetings; but the Secretary of Commerce has furnished to the committee and to the House as provided by law a comprehensive and detailed statement of the expenditures of that department for the last fiscal year. We have been going over that, not on the theory there was anything wrong, but that it was the duty of that committee to analyze and audit those reports and render, if possible, some helpful service to this department. For this year the Department of Commerce under the Bureau of Census has a lump appropriation of $15,000,000 for the census. I think it is important that the Congress of the United States at least audit and supervise this tremendous expenditure, go into it and investigate it and see how the money is expended, and we have been trying to do that. I have been paying a clerk of that committee myself since the beginning of the session. I assumed when I was appointed chairman of this committee that it would have a clerk. Since I have been here every time a resolution has been offered to give a clerk to these committees I have always supported it. These committees have important work to do and should receive the same treatment as other committees of the House. They should be equipped as other committees or be abolished, one or the other. Now, it is up to Congress whether they furnish this clerk. Of course, I am not able to pay a clerk myself during the entire session, and I do not intend to do it, but I do say we have performed the work that this committee was created to perform, and the committee is entitled to a clerk.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Do you ask for a clerk for the rest of the session or the rest of the Congress?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The rest of the session, I understand; that is the purport of the resolution.

Mr. IRELAND. For the remainder of the second session?

Mr. RAMSEYER. It would not be over three or four months.

Mr. SNELL. We can not tell yet.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, of course, I want to be reimbursed for what I paid the clerk already, and I think the resolution provides for that. I do not see why the chairman of the committee should be expected to pay the clerk of the committee. It either ought not to have a clerk or it ought to be furnished one as a matter of course.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I understand up to date the gentleman has not received clerk hire?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not this session. This resolution has been reported out of the Committee on Accounts, but could not be reached in the House for consideration for some time. I understand it was unanimously reported from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. VAILE. I might say in justice to my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, that he has been paying the clerk of his committee. He omitted to make that statement himself, but it should be made in justice to him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the chairmen of other committees have done the same. This resolution should have been acted on early in the session. That is all I have to say.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. STEVENSON. I just wanted a minute or two.

Mr. IRELAND. I yield two minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to indorse what was said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BRUMBAUGH] about the Committee on Railways and Canals. I was on that committee during the Sixty-fifth Congress. We had a number of meetings and had under consideration one of the most important commercial developments—one that concerns the Middle West—in this country. The committee met faithfully, and, as the gentleman who is now chairman of this committee was always there, I have no doubt he has faithfully discharged his duties now, and I think the committee ought to have a clerk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now reverts upon the passage of the resolution.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 94, noes 11.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the House having divided, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. Evidently no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors and the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees. Those in favor of the resolution will, as their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 243, nays 54, answered "present" 2, not voting 127, as follows:

INCREASED COMPENSATION, NAVY AND COAST GUARD.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 499.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall be discharged from the consideration of the bill H. R. 11927 entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Coast Guard through the temporary provision of bonuses or increased compensation," and the Senate amendments thereto; that the said Senate amendments be, and hereby are, disagreed to by the House; the conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the said bill be, and hereby is, agreed to by the House, and the Speaker shall immediately appoint the conferees without intervening motion.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the resolution fully explains its purpose. It is for the purpose of sending the House bill 11927 to conference.

This bill was passed in the House on January 23 under a special order. The final vote on the bill was 310 for, 11 against. Your Committee on Rules are unanimously of the opinion that they are carrying out the expressed wish of the majority of the Members of the House when they ask you to adopt this rule and send this bill to conference.

That is all I desire to say. Does the gentleman from North Carolina desire some time?

Mr. POU. I would like to have 10 minutes, part of which I will yield.

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Speaker, I want first, if I can, to get some information about this proposed rule for a conference, and I would like to ask the gentleman who reported the rule if there is any understanding between the Committee on Rules and the steering committee of the House as to the personnel of these conferees?

Mr. SNELL. In answer to the gentleman I will state that I do not know personally who the conferees will be.

Mr. CRAGO. I would like to know if the gentleman has any knowledge as to the purpose of this rule in the way of the appointment of these conferees?

Mr. SNELL. So far as the conferees are concerned, I can not tell the gentleman who they will be.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. This is a bill from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and under the universal practice of the House the members of the conference committee on the part of the House will, of course, be members of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CRAGO. I will say to the gentleman that in case they are, it would appear to me to be in violation of the arrangement between the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs and certain members of the Committee on Military Affairs when this matter was under consideration.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. I positively deny the statement. I have never had any conversation with Senator WADSWORTH, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs on the subject of this bill.

Mr. CRAGO. Does the gentleman deny the fact that when this bill came back from the Senate he said to several members of the Committee on Military Affairs, "Now, we will have a conference committee composed of members of both committees, just as they have in the Senate"?

Mr. BUTLER. I said I would consult the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs as to a division of the conferees between the Committee on Naval Affairs and the Committee on Military Affairs. I consulted my colleagues, and they unanimously declined to join.

Mr. CRAGO. In other words, the Committee on Naval Affairs refuse at this time to agree that any one from the Committee on Military Affairs should be on this conference committee?

Mr. BUTLER. The Committee on Naval Affairs, I think, with 17 members present, unanimously agreed that the conferees upon what is known as the Kelley bill, which is involved in this measure that we now have before us, should be appointed from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CRAGO. Now, then, that is all I wanted to find out about the situation, and I think that is sufficient. Here is the situation: It was represented to the Committee on Rules that the Committee on Military Affairs had not, as I get it from the Committee on Rules this morning, presented this bill to the House. On the calendar you will find two bills coming from that committee, providing for an increase of 20 per cent and other increases to the enlisted personnel of the Army and Navy and Marine Corps and the officers up to a certain grade. After those bills were reported from our committee—and they were reported unanimously—we tried to get a rule and an agreement as to some disposition of these bills. When this Kelley bill was presented to the House it was represented to the Commitee on Military Affairs, "Let this bill go through and we will see to it that before its enactment into law," or words to that effect, "the noncommissioned officers and officers of the Navy, Army, Marine Corps, and Public Health Service would be taken care of."

In the Senate, when the Kelley bill was considered, it was amended by substituting the so-called Wadsworth bill, which is a bill which provides, in addition to the 10 per cent increase in the base pay, for a ration increase. That came back from the Senate, and the Senate notified the House that they had appointed conferees to adjust the difference between the two Houses. The conferees in the Senate are composed of members of the Committee on Military Affairs and members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and it was our understanding, until two days ago, that that was the course which would be followed in the House, and that the conferees, representing these two arms of the service, would get together on a proper bill providing for an increase of the pay of the officers and men of the Navy, the Army, the Marine Corps, and the Public Health Service.

Now, what that increase shall be I have no set opinion; I have no determination. But I do know this, gentlemen, that it is just as important that the enlisted personnel of the Army and the commissioned personnel of the Army should have some increase at this time as it is that the enlisted personnel and lower officers of the Navy shall have some increase at this time. In spite of all that has been said in the interest of economy and against this increase, you are facing this proposition in the Army and Navy. Nothing more nor less than the business proposition whereby a young man has no other source of income than his salary is compelled to get out of the Army or Navy, and only the men who are subsidized by some estate or by their parents can afford to remain in either branch of the service, just as it is in the English Army and in the English Navy.

We take these young men from the high schools of our country who have no other income, send them to West Point, and they serve 10, 15, or 20 years in the service and find themselves with wives and families for whom they must care with the pay which comes to them with the rank of captain, and you know that the teachers in the high schools of this country, even though they may have no family obligations, can not live on anything of that kind.

Now, those are only a few of the conditions that we are facing, and the only alternative we have here to-day is either to amend this rule to provide that men shall be on that conference committee who represent these different arms of the service, or else defeat the rule; because, if we are to believe the press reports—and I am not very strong on press reports—this rule could not be gotten out of the Rules Committee until the leaders on this side of the House had an understanding with the Naval Committee that nothing would be considered in this conference except the Kelley bill, and the Kelley bill provides for nothing except an increase of the pay of the noncommissioned personnel of the Navy; and you know that it is simply an indirect way of shutting the door on this House and preventing it considering any proposition on its merits to make a proper increase in the pay of the noncommissioned personnel of the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps, or such officers of that service as need this increase of pay. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL].

Mr. PELL. Mr. Speaker, all the officers of the Navy to-day are men very highly trained, very highly educated, men of the greatest loyalty. It would be absolutely impossible to extemporize a group of men as good as they are. There is a general feeling among the American people, which is unfortunate, that you can take almost any man and tie a sword on him and he becomes amply able to command a regiment; but there is not that idea concerning the Navy. The whole people of this country realize that it is most necessary for us to maintain an efficient naval organization. It would take generations to build up such a body of men as we have now in the Navy. There has never been a time when they have been called upon for any service to this country that they have not responded loyally, intelligently, and bravely.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PELL. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I will ask the gentleman if that same thing can not be said about the officers of the Army?

Mr. PELL. Absolutely the same thing can be said of the Army.

Mr. HARRISON. Then why draw a distinction between the Navy and the Army?

Mr. PELL. The Army is in the same condition. This bill, however, is for the naval officers only. I should say exactly the same thing in favor of the officers of the Army. The gentleman is quite right about that. The distinction should not be made. Every person here who has known officers of either the Army or the Navy intimately realizes that those officers are to-day making very serious sacrifices for the good of their country; that they would be in almost every case able to get very much larger pay than they are now receiving, and they would be able to live better. The condition is becoming more than that of mere sacrifice. It is becoming a condition of martyrdom. Now, to allow these men to go and to replace them with others as we need them quickly would mean that the organization which has been built up for more than a hundred years would be shattered. You can not extemporize institutions. You can not extemporize an organized body. You can gather the individuals, you can teach them, but you do not get that greatest thing of all, the loyalty of the individual to his organization and to his group.

I trust that in the near future we are to have a long peace, and that will mean very slow promotions. It will mean the slow rise of all these officers. Unless we treat them generously we will not be able to get the type of men that we want.

Now, we have been accustomed in the past to draw our officers from the very best types of young men, of the highest intelligence, the best ideals, and the noblest characters. I believe we should continue to do so. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SNELL. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO].

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to weary the House with my continual talk on this proposition. I would simply like to ask if it is possible to have this rule amended so that both committees can be represented from the House, as they are represented from the Senate? Will the chairman of the Naval Committee agree to that?

Mr. BUTLER. With all my great liking for my friend, I positively say no, because I was instructed by my committee to say no.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the Rules Committee agree to an amendment to this rule by which both committees can be represented?

Mr. SNELL. The chairman of the Rules Committee thinks it would not be proper at this time.

Mr. CRAGO. Then, gentlemen of the House, I think there is only one thing to do.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLNEY. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. CRAGO. I yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. OLNEY. Does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania believe that if we do not defeat this resolution, then under the circumstances the officers' pay bill will be practically shelved, and that while the enlisted men and the noncommissioned officers will be taken care of there will be nothing done during this session to increase the pay of officers in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Public Health Service?

Mr. CRAGO. Only the noncommissioned officers of the Navy will be taken care of. I agree with the gentleman that it is just another step to tie the hands of the House to prevent it from being able to take any action, whether favorable or not, on a bill to increase the pay of the commissioned officers in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, and the Public Health Service.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE] asked me first.

Mr. BEE. I understand from the gentleman from Pennsylvania that if we adopt this rule there will be no opportunity for the consideration of a measure to increase the pay of the enlisted men and officers of the Army, but only of the Navy?

Mr. CRAGO. That is true if the powers on this side of the House have their way.

Mr. RUCKER. What does the gentleman mean by "this side of the House"?

Mr. CRAGO. The Republican side, my own side.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Gladly.

Mr. CANNON. Is there anything to prevent the Committee on Military Affairs from considering a bill that will care for the situation?

Mr. CRAGO. We have considered it and we had started the consideration of a combination bill providing increase for all branches of the service with the approval of the Naval Committee, and some leaders of the House represented to the Military Committee that representatives of the Naval Committee would agree practically to a bill which was reported from the Military Affairs Committee——

Mr. CANNON. If this rule is adopted, is there anything to prevent the Committee on Military Affairs from presenting a bill that will care for the Army, without saying anything about the merits of the bill?

Mr. CRAGO. Nothing to prevent our presenting such a bill, but there is something to prevent its consideration. They are trying to get the advantage of slipping this through because they think that then there would be no disposition to do anything for the Army, and I do not believe there would.

Mr. CANNON. But a majority of the House has the power to pass any bill.

Mr. CRAGO. If they get the chance.

Mr. CANNON. You will have the same chance that other people have.

Mr. CRAGO. With all due deference to the gentleman and his legislative wisdom, this is an attempt to shut the doors on this kind of legislation. Once we adopt this rule, we will never get any action of this House on this other matter. I want to call attention to the fact that the vote was 300 to 11 in favor of the Kelley bill, but that was after it was understood that that was not the end of this matter.

Mr. CANNON. As one Member of the House, not on either committee, I am not bound by what a few members on the Naval Committee and the Military Committee may agree with reference to the rules of the House.

Mr. CRAGO. That is absolutely correct, and the gentleman should not be bound.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Am I correct in understanding the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that as a member of the Military Affairs Committee he made an appeal to the so-called steering committee of the Republican side for fair treatment for the Army and it was refused?

Mr. CRAGO. I would qualify that; we spent one hour with them trying to show them that it was absolutely necessary to do something to increase the pay of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps and did not succeed.

Mr. DEWALT. Your request was not granted?

Mr. CRAGO. It was not granted.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. As I understand it, if this resolution is adopted the net result will be that the conferees will be able to increase the compensation payable to the officers of the Navy, but will be powerless to do anything in the way of increasing compensation to officers in the Army.

Mr. CRAGO. That is true; only this does not apply to the officers except the noncommissioned officers. I want to say that if we defeat this rule there will be some way to take care of all of them hereafter.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I take it that the House will not be surprised to learn that there were some members of the Committee on Rules who were not consulted by the steering committee in regard to this rule. The minority members have not had any conversation with the steering committee and they have not had any conference with the prospective conferees in the Senate. They have no knowledge whatever of what is to be the final result. As this matter stands, as it presented itself to the minority members, this rule offered the simplest and easiest method to secure rapid action in a regular, decent, and parliamentary way upon a matter which was brought before the House and passed as an emergency proposition.

The bill came originally from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and it was urged upon the House by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] as being very necessary to protect the Navy in securing reenlistments, and it was very largely on that idea that the House rapidly passed the measure. It went to the other body, and that body—well apparently if there was anything they did not put on it it was something that they forgot. So it comes back with a confused jurisdiction. The minority proceeded along the plain simple lines of letting the matter go to conference in order to expedite legislation.

Now, having said that much, in view of what was said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] as to the leader of the majority suppressing future action, I think it is proper to say a little more. If it be true that the steering committee, as the gentleman has stated, has reached that frame of mind where no opportunity is to be given to consider legislation from the Committee on Military Affairs to increase pay of Army men in the regular way, and there are a sufficient number in the House who desire to consider it at this time, I can suggest to you a method whereby it can be done—not by defeating the rule, because the steering committee might not let the majority bring in another rule.

You have the rule before you now, and if you will vote down the previous question you can amend the rule to do whatever you desire to do. [Applause.] We minority men have no particular pride nor any responsibility about this matter; we are glad to do our part in giving the House the opportunity to do whatever the majority of its Members want to do.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. That is exactly what I intend asking the House to do.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. I understand the rule can not be amended except the previous question is voted down, and then the House can amend it.

Mr. GARRETT. It can.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I will.

Mr. TINCHER. If the rule is amended to comply with the ideas of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the salaries of the officers of the Army may be increased without this House ever having a right to consider the matter at all, except the conference committee.

Mr. GARRETT. That might be. As far as the rule is concerned that might be done. The rule does not prevent anything of the sort. The minority knows nothing about the secret collaborations that are going on, but took things at their face value.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has four minutes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, there is one suggestion which I desire to submit to the House with regard to this rule. I think it is unfortunate that the rule is so drawn that the House can not instruct the conferees. The great Health Department of the Government is in a most unfortunate condition because of the inadequate salaries paid to those in the Health Service. I think it is unfortunate that the conferees can not take care of those salaries along with the other salaries they have jurisdiction of under this rule. I therefore venture to hope that the House may have some assurance that in the near future the Public Health Service will receive consideration at the hands of the proper committee.

Mr. PADGETT. They are in the Senate amendment.

Mr. POU. I know they are; but unfortunately the Senate amendment can not be considered under the gentlemen's agreement which we hear has been entered into. I am told that doctors in the Health Service are resigning; that that service is losing some of its best men; and that unless something is done within the near future the service faces chaos and disorganization. I throw out this suggestion for what it is worth.

As the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has suggested, there is one way by which the House can take charge of this matter, and that is by voting down the previous question. If the previous question is voted down, then the rule is open for amendment, and those who believe the Senate amendments should be considered will have opportunity to move to instruct the conferees.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to take just one minute to make a very short statement, and that is, that there is nothing whatever in this rule that prevents us at some future time from considering the Army pay bill, which has not been considered in the House, and when it has been considered there will be plenty of time to take up the proposition of conference. So far as I am concerned, I am not opposed to a proposition for the Army similar to this, and there is nothing in this resolution to prevent it. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I am just a little surprised that the minority members of the Committee on Rules, having reported a rule, and reported a rule approvingly, as everybody understood it, thinking that by so doing they might start a little trouble in the House, should now propose to the gentlemen of the majority that perhaps it would be well to now amend the rule which they have presented. What is the situation? This is a rule in accordance with the regular practice of the House. The only thing it does is to send this bill to conference. What the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] wants is a violation of, or at least a departure from, the usual and, I think, universal and unbroken rule of the House, to have conferees appointed from the committee that considered the legislation in the House. He wants conferees appointed from another committee, and why? Because in the Senate there was placed on the bill certain amendments not in the jurisdiction of the committee that reported the legislation in the House. We would get ourselves into a fine pickle if we started in doing that sort of thing. Suppose the Committee on Ways and Means reports a bill and that bill is passed through the House. The bill goes to the Senate, and the Senate, having seen fit to do so, should place on the bill certain amendments within the jurisdiction of half a dozen committees of the House, and it then should be demanded in the House that in the naming of the conferees every committee which might have jurisdiction over some one of the Senate amendments, if they had originated in the House, should be represented on the conference committee. The mere statement of the situation shows how ridiculous the proposal is. We have followed a certain rule in the matter of conference committees here since the beginning, since the establishment of this Congress.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. And I do not think Congress wants to depart from it at this time. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CRAGO. If we had followed the usual rule, we would not be considering this resolution at this time, but we would simply have sent the bill to conference without a special rule.

Mr. MONDELL. The only way to send it to conference without a rule is by unanimous consent, and the gentleman evidently believes a number of gentlemen in the House would refuse unanimous consent, for neither he nor anyone else has asked unanimous consent. Therefore a rule becomes essential. This is a rule to send legislation to conference without instructing the conferees in any way, leaving the entire matter in their hands under the ordinary usual practice of the House, and I am sure the House does not want to depart from that practice in the method suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO].

What the gentleman from Pennsylvania really wants is this, that there shall be a representative of another committee on the conference in order that that representative may insist that the conferees shall bring into the House legislation involving great expenditures in a matter that the House has never considered. That is what the gentleman wants. That is his only object in insisting upon having a conferee from another committee.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. If this special rule should pass, and conferees should be appointed in accordance with it, would they not have jurisdiction of all legislation that has been passed by this House on that question?

Mr. MONDELL. They would have jurisdiction of the House bill, and of the Senate amendments. They would have just as much jurisdiction as though there was on the conference committee a representative from the Military Affairs Committee of the House. The insistence on the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania grows out of the fact that he hopes or would like to have on the conference a representative of the Military Affairs Committee, who would insist upon the House taking the Senate bill, including a number of matters that the House has never considered.

Mr. REAVIS. That is, if the gentleman will permit, to permit the conferees to legislate in conference for the House.

Mr. MONDELL. That is the idea exactly. That is the purpose. The ordinary practice of the House should not be overturned by any such procedure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution to final passage.

The question was taken.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. BRITTEN (while the House was dividing). Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays. As many as are in favor of taking the vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Eighty-seven Members have risen, a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 136, nays 153, answered "present" 1, not voting 136, as follows:

The name of Mr. LANGLEY was called and he answered "present."

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "no."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening when his name was called?

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. No.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman does not qualify.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening when his name was called?

Mr. CLEARY. I just came in and was unable to answer to my name; I was in the door.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman does not qualify.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question is not agreed to and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] is entitled to recognition. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. POU offers the following substitute for House resolution 499:

"Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall be discharged from the consideration of the bill H. R. 11927, entitled 'An act to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Coast Guard through the temporary provision of bonuses or increased compensation,' and the Senate amendments thereto; and it shall be in order to move that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference requested by the Senate, and the Speaker shall appoint the conferees: Provided, That during the consideration of same it shall be in order to make all motions in order under the general rules of the House."

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, the difference between this resolution and the resolution that was proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] is that the effect of the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York would have been to have immediately, without intervening motion, sent the measure to conference, and the conferees would have been appointed without any opportunity for instruction. Under the resolution offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], if it be adopted, and the House proceeds to the consideration, as it will under the rule, of the bill mentioned, it will be in order for any gentleman at the proper time to make such motion with reference to the instruction of the conferees—of course, carrying germane matter in his motion—as he may desire to make.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman yields back three minutes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the substitute.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. KNUTSON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota demands a division. All in favor of ordering the previous question will rise and stand until counted.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ayes have it, and the previous question having been ordered, the question now is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois moves to concur in the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and the motion to concur was rejected.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will announce the conferees.

The following conferees were announced:

Mr. BUTLER, Mr. BROWNING, Mr. KELLEY of Michigan, Mr. PADGETT, and Mr. RIORDAN.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13108, the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13108, the naval appropriation bill, with Mr. MANN of Illinois in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13108) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I also yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for one hour.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE ST. LAWRENCE ROUTE THROUGH THE GREAT LAKES TO THE SEA—A NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL PROJECT—THE KEY TO THE SOLUTION OF THE TRANSPORTATION PROBLEM OF THE GREAT WEST AS WELL AS THE KEY TO THE FUEL AND POWER CRISIS OF THE EASTERN SEABOARD.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the time allotted me I desire to call your attention to the proposed development of the international water route from the Great Lakes through the St. Lawrence River to the sea, jointly with the Dominion of Canada, that will accommodate ocean-going vessels. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that we are quite agreed that one of the greatest and most important problems in the economy of our national life to-day is the problem of adequate transportation at reasonable cost to both producer and consumer. The greatest need of America and of the world to-day is a larger production from the farm, mine, and factory, and from the general industries of the essentials and necessities of life, a larger development of all our natural resources. The world is pleading for food and for the necessities of life. This need should and must be met. America must and will do her share in supplying it. Our railroads and our inland waterways are the arteries through which must flow our ever-increasing production and expanding traffic. They are the highways of the future prosperity and happiness of our people.

THE PROJECT.

The project is one of national and international importance. It has two important phases—transportation and water power. I desire to discuss the need and importance of both. I wish to give full credit for facts and figures upon which I base my arguments to the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, the Geological Survey, and the Army engineers.

STATES OF THE TIDEWATER ASSOCIATION.

The Great Lakes and St. Lawrence Tidewater Association is a voluntary association of 14 member States, including Wisconsin, Minnesota, Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Iowa, North Dakota, South Dakota, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado and Nebraska. The first three of these States have aided the movement through State commissions created by their respective legislatures. These States are to-day in a voluntary cooperative effort attempting to impress this Nation and Congress with the urgent need of adequate transportation facilities at reduced rates, to be provided by the proper development of our inland waterways. And I wish to impress upon Congress and this Nation to-day the fact that these great Western States between the Rockies and the Alleghenies, constituting the very heart of the United States, are to-day banded together in this voluntary association because of a common national need and a common national interest in one of the greatest and most far-reaching enterprises of the century in affording this vast territory of industry and production a proper outlet to the Atlantic seaboard by way of the Great Lakes.

The feasibility and desirability of the development of this project has been discussed for several decades. Progress was interrupted in 1914 by the great World War. But on March 2, 1919, my colleague, Senator IRVINE L. LENROOT, of Wisconsin, whose deep and farseeing statesmanship is always alert to the best interests of our Nation, had incorporated into the rivers and harbors act a provision requesting the International Joint Commission "to investigate what further improvement of the St. Lawrence River, between Montreal and Lake Ontario, is necessary to make the same navigable for ocean-going vessels, together with the estimated cost thereof, and report to the Government of the Dominion of Canada and to the Congress of the United States, with its recommendations, for cooperation by the United States with the Dominion of Canada in the improvement of said river."

The following letter from the former Secretary of State, Hon. Robert Lansing, to the International Joint Commission, and the instructions to the field engineers by the engineers in charge on the part of the two Governments will be of interest:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D. C., January 21, 1920.

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to inform you that the Governments of the United States of America and of the Dominion of Canada, under the provisions of article 9 of the treaty of the 11th of January, 1909, between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, herewith refer certain questions, as set forth below, "involving the beneficial use of the waters of the St. Lawrence River, between Montreal and Lake Ontario, in the interests of both countries, and in general the rights, obligations, or interests of either in relation to the other, or to the inhabitants of the other along their common frontier."

It is desired that the said questions be made the basis of an investigation to be carried out by the International Joint Commission, to the end that the said commission may submit a report to the two countries covering the subject matter of this reference, together with such conclusions and recommendations as may be considered pertinent in the premises.

Question I: What further improvement in the St. Lawrence River, between Montreal and Lake Ontario, is necessary to make the same navigable for deep-draft vessels of either the lake or ocean going type? What draft of water is recommended and what is the estimated cost?

In answering this question the commission is requested to consider:

(a) Navigation interests alone, whether by the construction of locks and dams in the river; by side canals with the necessary locks; or by a combination of the two.

(b) The combination of navigation and power interests to obtain the greatest beneficial use of the waters of the river.

Question II: Which of the schemes submitted by the Government or other engineers is preferred, and why?

Question III: Under what general method of procedure and in what general order shall the various physical and administrative features of the improvement be carried out?

Question IV: Upon what basis shall the capital cost of the completed improvement be apportioned to each country?

Question V: Upon what basis shall the costs of operation and maintenance be apportioned to each country?

Question VI: What method of control is recommended for the operation of the improved waterway to secure its most beneficial use?

Question VII: Will regulating Lake Ontario increase the low-water flow in the St. Lawrence ship channel below Montreal? And if so, to what extent and at what additional cost?

Question VIII: To what extent will the improvement develop the resources, commerce, and industry of each country?

Question IX: What traffic, both incoming and outgoing, in kind and quantity, is likely to be carried upon the proposed route both at its inception and in the future, consideration to be given not only to present conditions but to probable changes therein resulting from the development of industrial activities due to availability of large quantities of hydraulic power?

Pending the receipt of plans, estimates, and other engineering data necessary for the final consideration of this reference, the commission is requested to hold such public hearings as may be considered necessary or advisable in order to obtain all information bearing directly or indirectly on the physical, commercial, and economic feasibility of the project as a whole.

To facilitate the preparation of the desired report each Government will, from its official engineering personnel, appoint an engineer with full authority to confer with a similar officer of the other Government for the purpose: First, of acquiring, each in his own country, such data as may be found necessary to supplement the existing engineering data and surveys; and, second, of preparing complete outline plans for and estimates of the cost of the proposed improvement, including the value of all property, easements, damages, and rights connected therewith. These plans and estimates are to be submitted to the commission as soon as practicable, but not later than one year from the date of appointment, and the commission is requested to forward to the two Governments its final report, with recommendation not later than three months thereafter. A copy of the instructions furnished these engineers is attached hereto.

I am, gentlemen,
Your obedient servant, ROBERT LANSING.

INSTRUCTIONS TO ENGINEERS IN CHARGE ST. LAWRENCE RIVER, MONTREAL TO LAKE ONTARIO, NAVIGATION PROJECT.

You are hereby designated to take charge of the survey of the St. Lawrence River, Montreal to Lake Ontario, for the purpose of preparing plans and estimates for its further improvement to make the same navigable for deep-draft vessels of either the lake or ocean-going type, and to obtain the greatest beneficial use from these waters.

The surveys, plans, and estimates are to be submitted to the International Joint Commission within 12 months, and are to assist the commission in answering the questions of a reference to the matter under the provisions of article 9 of the treaty of the 11th of January, 1909, between the United States and Great Britain. (A copy of the letter of reference is inclosed for your information.)

It is desired to expedite the completion of the duty confided to you by utilizing all available surveys and other reliable information, whether derived from public or from private sources. That a proper basis of procedure may be agreed upon in the first instance and the field work and the preparation of plans and estimates promptly and efficiently carried on thereafter, you are requested to confer fully and freely with (name of individual to be inserted), who has been designated to take charge of corresponding duties on behalf of the (name of country to be inserted), to arrange for the division of the field work, and for cooperation in the preparation of the desired plans and estimates. While it is clear that the field work necessary to complete existing information may properly and advantageously be divided, cooperation and unity in the preparation of plans and estimates seem preferable.

It will be noted that the reference to the joint commission contemplates four different general schemes or methods of improvements, as follows:

(a) By means of locks and navigation dams in the river.
(b) By means of locks and side canals.
(c) By a combination of the two preceding methods.
(d) By means of locks and power dams.

The plans and estimates should definitely cover these four general schemes or methods of improvement, but other variations of them may be considered and, if deemed desirable, also presented to the commission.

The channels to be considered are to be of 25 and 30 feet depth at low water, and the plans and estimates should be prepared correspondingly. A choice between them will, under the terms of the reference, be made by the commission.

As detailed plans can not be prepared within the time limit of one year fixed for this work, it is desired that merely outline plans and lump-sum estimates, based upon experience from similar work, such as the enlargement of the Welland Canal and power development at Niagara Falls, should be submitted.

The general schemes should be furnished to the commission showing: First, the best for navigation alone; and, second, for the most efficient utilization of the waters of the St. Lawrence for navigation and power, together with the approximate costs thereof.

As the handling and disposal of ice is a fundamental difficulty on the St. Lawrence River, the arrangements regarded as being necessary for this purpose should be discussed as well as those recommended for ice disposal during the construction period and thereafter.

Regulation of the levels of Lake Ontario so as to equalize the discharge of the St. Lawrence may be desirable in the interest of navigation, of ice disposal, and of power development. If the plans include any provisions for such regulation, an explanation should be furnished to make clear just what is proposed.

Finally, you are requested to keep the International Joint Commission fully advised of your progress and to maintain close and sympathetic touch with it so as to insure complete coordination.

C. KELLAR.
WM. J. STEWART.

A circular letter under date of February 16, 1920, by Hon. Whitehead Kluttz, secretary of the Joint Commission, gives us the information that the engineers appointed by the two governments are now engaged in the making of surveys and the preparation of plans and estimates for the information of the commission. It also states that the commission purposes holding a series of public hearings, at which all interested parties for or against the proposed development will be given an opportunity of expressing their views. As a preliminary step the commission is now requesting all National, State, provincial, municipal, commercial, transportation, and other bodies interested in the development of trade routes from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic seaboard to submit for its information a concise statement, to be supplemented later at the public hearings by more detailed statements, of their views as to the desirability or otherwise of the suggested deep waterway; its probable effect on the development of commerce in the Great Lakes and between Lake ports and ocean ports; what influence it would have on industrial development on either side of these boundary waters, particularly on the upper St. Lawrence; what its effect would be, if established, on existing or other projected water routes between the Great Lakes and the Atlantic; and the advantages and disadvantages of combining power development with the improvement of navigation on the upper St. Lawrence.

A NATIONAL PROJECT.

That the consideration of this project is national in scope and most opportune in time can scarcely be denied when one is reminded that this great project has been thoroughly discussed by our most prominent engineers and engineering bodies and always admitted as a most feasible water route and a development much to be desired as a relief to our overburdened transportation facilities, and as a needed hydroelectric power in our seaboard industries.

The following comprehensive statements upon this subject by the Hon. Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy; the Hon. John Barton Payne, chairman of the United States Shipping Board and now Secretary of the Interior; Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood of the United States Army; and Hon. Franklin K. Lane, ex-Secretary of the Interior, show that this subject is of the largest national importance and has their most hearty and unqualified indorsement:

THE NEXT GREAT TASK.

The supreme duty of America lies with reference to water and ocean transportation. Before the war the business of the railroads was much greater than could be handled, and it was necessary, when the stress of war came, for the Government to take them over in order to transport the soldiers, supplies, munitions, and materials to the seaboard. The business of our country will continually expand, and it is our duty to secure the lowest transportation costs possible.

The railroads will have all they can do to haul the lighter freight from and to inland towns, and we must look to water transportation for the heavy freight.

To this end our waterways should be improved and our merchant marine should be strengthened; and our rivers and harbors should be deepened.

This country has always had a vision of some great enterprise—as evidence, the Panama Canal and the Alaskan Railroad, which were in keeping with the spirit of our country when we built the great transcontinental railroad. Now, the big thing is water transportation.

A thorough study should be made of inland transportation, and I believe one of the most important improvements is to make it possible to have water transportation for large ships through the Lakes from the Atlantic and by barges down the Mississippi River.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the Navy.

GREAT LAKES FLEETS IN THEIR INFANCY.

Referring to the deep waterway between the Lakes and the Atlantic Ocean, you are right in stressing the importance of such a waterway. The importance of Chicago alone, not only as a manufacturing and packing center, but also as a clearing house for shippers generally west of Illinois, argues strongly for bringing to the highest possible state of accessibility and efficiency all means of freight transportation.

The study which you are making of inland-water transportation in the United States should substantiate the contention that the Great Lakes transportation system, important as it is at present, is in its infancy, and that delay in its development will cost producers, shippers, and consumers millions of dollars yearly.

JOHN BARTON PAYNE,
Chairman United States Shipping Board.

ST. LAWRENCE ROUTE ESSENTIAL.

We must amplify, and in a measure reshape, our transportation system. We must improve our waterways to the greatest possible limit. Congestion of freight during the war demonstrated the need of increased transportation facilities. The railroads did excellent work under heavy handicap, but the demand of the situation exceeded at times their capacity.

In any comprehensive scheme of development the line of water communication from the Great Lakes to the sea via the St. Lawrence is an essential element. It is but an extension of the Great Lakes highway upon which our products may move to market at the most advantageous rates. If we can complete the system, it will be the shortest and most direct route to northern Europe. It will furnish most economical transportation of foodstuffs and raw materials and will furnish a readily available line for transportation to the Atlantic seaboard in case of need.

Added transportation facilities means added trade and a better opportunity to compete with oversea markets.

LEONARD WOOD,
Major General, United States Army.

NEW SOURCE OF ENERGY.

The St. Lawrence deep waterway project is of great importance to the United States for the reason that 113 miles of this waterway is international boundary, in which we have a one-half interest in any power development that may result from the work necessary to render the river navigable. Our interest in the commerce which would pass through this improved waterway would probably be much greater than one-half.

It is recognized that the only present obstacle to sea-borne commerce is the existing unnavigable condition of the river from Montreal to Lake Ontario. The Welland and Soo Canals, now in course of reconstruction, will accommodate probably 90 per cent of ocean-going vessels. It is possible that some minor improvement will be necessary between Lake Erie and Lake Huron in order to accommodate vessels of 10,000 tons. Vessels of less tonnage may be accommodated by the present depth of water at that point.

It has been truly stated that when this work is completed the Great Lakes will be an American Mediterranean Sea for at least eight months of the year, and important Lake cities would become practically seaports, relieving the railroads of a tremendous burden of traffic and enabling the wheat growers of the Middle West to have quicker dispatch to foreign markets at a saving of at least 5 cents per bushel in freight charges.

My interest has been chiefly directed, however, to the wonderful development necessarily involved in this project for the improvement of navigation. Under favorable conditions of power load factor and of river regulation by Lake storage, it would appear that full utilization would give to the United States 420,000,000 kilowatt hours a month in addition to the 30,000,000 already developed on the St. Lawrence. Translated into terms of fuel conservation, this new power would exceed by nearly 50 per cent the present output of fuel-generated electricity in the public utility plants of New York State.

This new source of energy for the continuous use of industry appeals to the imagination, and while the development necessary to make this power available is a great work, that need not block the project. It is said that private capital is available to undertake the navigation improvement in consideration of grant of the power privileges. No doubt this is true, and no doubt no such foolish bargain will be made.

I hope, for the reasons above stated and for many others which might be specified, that this work may soon be jointly undertaken by the United States and Canada.

FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary of the Interior.

The Hon. Herbert Hoover, United States Food Administrator, and the Hon. Julius H. Barnes, chairman of the United States Grain Corporation, also recommend and indorse this project as essential and necessary to our economic welfare, and as a route that would put millions of dollars annually into the pockets of the farmers and producers of the great Middle and Western States. They are agreed that it is essential to increased production and as an aid to reduction in the high cost of living, as it will relieve the annual congestion caused by the shortage of railroad cars, which often amounts to a stricture in the free flow of commodities from the farmer and producer to the consumer. In other words, the farmer and the producer make sacrifices in the price of their commodities sold in the local glutted market, while the consumer, at the other end, is compelled to pay increased prices for foodstuffs, due to the shortage of cars in movement.

THREE CLASSES OF WATERWAYS.

The three classes of waterways which are desirable and economical to improve at almost any cost are: (a) short canals, with locks and dams, which will cut off thousands of miles in sea distances, as do the Suez and the Panama Canals; (b) waterways which by means of locks and dams form short links in long natural waterway courses connecting larger bodies of water to give easy access to ports such as the Soo, the Welland, and the proposed St. Lawrence; and (c) artificial canals or deep channels that give inland cities direct access to the sea like Manchester, Amsterdam, Hamburg, Bremen, Rotterdam, Antwerp, and others without transfer of cargo.

ENGINEERING DATA FROM GOVERNMENT REPORTS CONCERNING FEASIBILITY AND COST OF THE ST. LAWRENCE ROUTE.

The report of the United States Deep Waterway Commission is printed in House Document No. 192, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session. After considering the subject in its various aspects, the Deep Waterway Commission reported, among other things, as follows:

That it is entirely feasible to construct such canals and develop such channels as will be adequate to any scale of navigation that may be desired between the several Great Lakes and to the seaboard and to conduct through the same domestic and foreign commerce. * * *.

The estimates of the Board of Engineers on Deep Waterways for those portions of the routes which would form a part of a deep waterway via the St. Lawrence River were as follows, based on a regulated surface:

	30-foot channel.	21-foot channel.
Lake Superior to Lake Erie	$33,539,869	$6,961,818
Lake Erie to Lake Ontario	73,435,350	42,393,203
Lake Ontario to St. Regis	35,514,438	21,027,113
	142,489,657	70,382,134

Since that report was submitted the Dominion of Canada has adopted a project for the enlargement of the Welland Canal to provide a preliminary depth of 25 feet at extreme low water in Lake Erie, namely, 568 feet above mean tide at New York, a stage about 2.8 feet below the datum plane of adopted projects for improvement by the United States on Lake Erie. Recent estimates for a waterway 25 feet deep on the American side between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario indicate that such a waterway following the route preferred by the Board of Engineers on Deep Waterways from La Salle to Lewiston would cost about $120,000,000, or about the cost of three battleships. However, in considering a through route by way of the St. Lawrence River, the greater part of which will be in Canadian waters, it is not essential to include a canal on the American side between Lakes Erie and Ontario, which would be merely a duplication of facilities to be provided on the Canadian side.

The report of this project by the Army engineers, published in House Document No. 1591, Sixty-fifth Congress, third session, gives us the information that the depth proposed by the district engineer, as fulfilling the requirements for a ship canal, was 25 feet. He reported that the plans of the Board of Engineers on Deep Waterways are acceptable to meet the inquiry of Congress, with certain modifications necessary to meet the changed conditions in the 17 miles immediately above St. Regis, resulting from the existence of important water-power developments. With these modifications he estimated the cost of a 25-foot waterway at $33,962,772.47. No official estimate has been made of the cost of improving the section from St. Regis to Montreal, but a recent unofficial estimate places the cost at $65,000,000, making a total cost of approximately $100,000,000 for improvement of the St. Lawrence River to afford a depth of 25 feet between Lake Ontario and Montreal.

It should be borne in mind, however, that the plans of the Board of Engineers on Deep Waterways were designed to provide a waterway primarily for navigation and are insufficient to afford opportunity for development of the important water-power resources of the river. With a mean discharge of 241,000 cubic feet per second and a fall of 222 feet between the foot of Lake Ontario and Montreal, it will be realized that in this flow there lies an enormous undeveloped resource, and that the regularity of the flow, which varies scarcely 25 per cent between the minimum and the maximum, affords an unusual opportunity for successful power development. It has been estimated that in the sections above St. Regis, having a total fall of 92 feet, the theoretical power available amounts to 2,520,000, and assuming an efficiency of only 70 per cent, this would furnish 1,764,000 horsepower, having a value in that section of at least $10 to $12 per horsepower annually, or $17,640,000. The coal required to produce this amount of power in local power plants such as are usually found in connection with general manufacturing would be about 25,000,000 tons, valued at more than $100,000,000 annually, or practically the full cost of the improvement above Montreal for navigation purposes. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GALLAGHER. A great amount of that power on our side would go to the benefit of the State of New York, would it not?

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Yes; that is absolutely true, as I shall show before I close.

The total developable water power of the Great Lakes drainage basin is estimated at 10,000,000 horsepower. The power already developed within this area is roughly 1,000,000 horsepower in the United States and 1,500,000 horsepower in Canada.

At present the United States has no water-power policy. The general dam act of June 23, 1910, contains provisions covering the development of power by private companies on the navigable waterways of the country, designed to protect the interests of navigation, but the provisions of this act are not such as to encourage water-power development. The restrictions therein contained are such as to render water-power development generally unattractive to private capital, notwithstanding the fact that one of our most urgent requirements at the present time is an abundance of cheap power.

Gen. Charles Keller, Corps of Engineers, representing the United States, and Mr. William J. Stewart, chief hydrographer, representing the Dominion of Canada, have had several conferences, and have submitted recommendations to their respective Governments relative to the scope of the investigation. It may be proper to state that the recommendations include the making of such field investigations as may be required to develop plans and estimates of cost for channels 25 and 30 feet deep.

AGRICULTURAL PROMOTION BY THIS PROJECT.

Agriculture is more vital to our Nation's life and welfare and to future generations than all the other industries combined. It is the foundation stone for our entire financial and commercial structure and the motive spring for the advancement of our civilization and national life. Hence the development of the rich agricultural area of the great West tributary to the Great Lakes is our first and most pressing need. This vital need can only be enhanced by cheaper and more adequate transportation facilities. Wheatless, meatless, and heatless days are not necessary in our American economy if we open the Great Lakes waterway to the Atlantic. [Applause.]

The standard rate for wheat shipped from Superior or Duluth to Liverpool was formerly 14 cents per bushel, divided approximately as follows:

From Superior or Duluth to Buffalo, 980 miles, including loading into elevator, 2.5 cents; from Buffalo to New York, 450 miles by rail or barge canal, including terminal charges, 6.5 cents; from New York to Liverpool, 3,000 miles, 5 cents. But it is no longer possible for the farmer to ship his grain to Liverpool at this rate. The cost now exceeds 50 cents per bushel, and there is no prospect of a reduction to anything like former rates. The savings by an all-water route amount to one-third of the charges by any other method, indicating a saving of about $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 annually, based on prewar freight rates, and several times as much, based on present rates. These large savings would go into the pockets of the farmers.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Yes. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SHREVE. Representing, as I do, one of the inland deep-water cities, I am interested in the gentleman's discussion, and I would like to ask him this question: Would the power that the gentleman has mentioned be available in Pennsylvania?

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. It would. At the present time the power of Niagara Falls is distributed to the east. This could then be released to Erie. Pennsylvania on Lake Erie will have tremendous advantages from this great development. Pennsylvania, as well as New York, will be benefited by the opening of this great waterway to the sea.

Mr. SHREVE. Here is another question: Is it the gentleman's thought that an ocean going ship would load at Chicago or Duluth or Buffalo or Toledo or Erie or any other port on the Great Lakes and be able to engage in ocean going commerce?

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Yes; every port on the Great Lakes would become an ocean port.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Yes. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DONOVAN. Do I understand that the proposed water route is through the Lakes and out the St. Lawrence and thence to the ocean?

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. What does the gentleman say about the St. Lawrence and the bay being open in winter to navigation?

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. It is open eight months for navigation, and it would be open all the time for water power. The eight months of open navigation is sufficient to carry all peak loads and relieve our present congested traffic conditions.

More efficient methods of distribution which in the end increase the net income of our farmers will make farming more attractive and add to the number who will make agricultural producers in our Nation. Larger production and better and cheaper distribution of our farm products will tend to check the high cost of living and at the same time increase the net income of our farmers, which in turn will produce larger production. Poor transportation facilities will underpay the farmer or producer and overcharge the consumer. The spread between producer and consumer to-day is too large, and it hits the farmer, the laborer, and the general public alike. Mounting prices and undue profiteering must be stopped if our social unrest and economic chaos are to be adjusted. The large agricultural interests of the Middle West demand the open route to the Atlantic Ocean by the St. Lawrence River through the Great Lakes. [Applause.]

Mr. Herbert Hoover has said in his exhaustive study of the food and transportation question that "one of the first things which an engineer in surveying this problem would advise would be the creation of a waterway all the way from the Great Lakes to the sea by way of the St. Lawrence River. By this arrangement the crops of the Middle West would have direct, expeditious, and economic access to the ocean. An engineer knows that this could be done at a lesser expense than would be involved in increasing our railroad facilities to care adequately for our marketing. Since the prices of this production are made at the other end in world competition, the cheapening of its transmission to the world's markets would go into the pockets of the farmer."

The profits of the farmer during the abnormal conditions brought on by the war have been encouraging to our agricultural production, but it is easy to see that short hours and high wages for labor, high cost of machinery and farm equipment plus inadequate and high cost of transportation will soon make it impossible for the farmer to produce at a sufficient and sustaining profit the large production necessary for our home and foreign demand. And let me say that what affects the farmer soon affects the entire structure of our economic and social life. The farm is still the foundation stone of our national as well as world wealth. The tilling to its highest efficiency the farms of our Nation becomes a vital reconstructive problem, worthy of our deepest study and concern.

The tide of immigration and migration is west, but the flow of the products of the farm, mine, and factory is eastward and across the sea. More than that, our rapidly growing population produces a commerce that flows both east and west and will tax to its utmost our transportation and power facilities. To help us a kind Providence has placed in the very heart of our continent the golden chain of Great Lakes, with transportation and power facilities and natural resources far exceeding that of any equal area in all the world. In our vision of the future, we can see in this project the Mediterranean of America, the great artery of commerce, the great storehouse of never-failing hydroelectric energy for our expanding industries. [Applause.]

THIS PROJECT SHOULD MEAN NOT COMPETITION BUT COOPERATION BETWEEN THE EAST AND WEST.

The only opposition to this project so far has come from Montreal, in Canada, and New York, in the United States. Montreal argues, "Why should Montreal give up her prestige for the benefit of ports of the United States on the Great Lakes and a few Canadian villages on the north shore?" Meantime New York argues, "Why should we spend our money to develop a waterway through Canada and promote the commerce of foreign ports and lessen the commerce of the port of New York?" Both are wrong; both are selfish. It is merely a case of selfish monopoly by reason of strategic position on the seaboard against the welfare and happiness of the entire people. [Applause.] Superior, Duluth, Ashland, Washburn, Racine, Milwaukee, Chicago, Toledo, Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo, and Erie have just as much right to have ocean steamers load and unload at their ports as do New York and Montreal. New York will always continue to have the advantage. She will always grow. She will always be the commanding port of the continent. This commanding commercial position no project can or will take away from her, nor would we care to do so. But let me say right here, New York in place of blocking this noble project should whole-heartedly support it, remembering that she owes to the great West and its development her own wonderful growth and place. The great West has helped New York; New York should aid the great West in return in a project of nation-wide mutual interest. Only in a spirit of cooperation of the development of our entire Nation in all its commercial possibilities and latent powers can lie our real American commercial supremacy over the other nations of the world.

Our Nation as a whole, and the great Middle West in particular, should not be sacrificed to the selfish and narrow provincialism of any one port or any one State or terminal. Such a narrow and contracted provincial vision will not mean the highest development of our Nation's supremacy in commerce and industry. New York, when she sees this project in its broadest aspect, will, I believe, enthusiastically support it. The opposition, I believe, is very limited, and the rank and file of the people of the great State of New York will overwhelmingly support this project when they realize the tremendous advantages to be derived for New York. She will win in hydroelectric power and teeming industrial life many times more than she will lose by the through cargoes on the St. Lawrence River, much of which will still continue to land in the New York port by this route.

Anyone in New York or in the eastern seaports inclined to oppose this most important economic project should read and clearly visualize the significant statement made by the broad-minded, farsighted, and constructive statesman, the Hon. Franklin K. Lane, in his annual report of 1919, when he states that "over 70 per cent of the available water power is west of the Mississippi, whereas over 70 per cent of the total horsepower now installed in prime movers is east of that river. Therefore unless the East is to lose its industrial supremacy it must press, and press hard, for the development of all water-power possibilities." New York and the Atlantic seaboard should, therefore, because of self-interest and for their future growth and welfare, join most heartily with the great Western States in a mutual program of giving to the West an outlet to the sea and to themselves their needed water-power development. The continued neglect of improving the Great Lakes waterway to the sea is nothing short of a national economic crime. [Applause.]

DIRECT BENEFITS OF THE PROJECT TO THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

If within 10 years the major portion of the available horsepower could be utilized at the present prices of coal, the total cost of the entire project would be saved in two years. The project of removing the St. Lawrence barrier to give the Great Lakes access to the sea is not an expenditure to encourage navigation but an investment in hydroelectric power that promises to pay large dividends.

Consider the importance of this hydroelectric development to the State of New York. High-tension transmission is at present practical over a radius of 260 miles. From the 20 or 30 miles of power developments along the international boundary the million horsepower would be distributed in an arc extending from Rochester down to Geneva, just north of Ithaca and south of Albany, taking in the great central area of New York State and the Champlain canal system, which grew rich and prosperous along the old Erie Canal.

This particular portion of the State is that which is farthest removed from the power of the Niagara Falls development, now entirely utilized by thriving industrial plants. The State of New York has built its magnificent new barge canal at a cost of about $160,000,000. This canal, throughout most of its length, is along a new location and its banks are empty of industrial development. The movements of cargo on the canal to date have been very slight. There are several reasons for this, but upon analyzing the figures of the old Erie Canal it will be seen that in the most prosperous days of the Erie Canal 73 per cent of the tonnage on the canal was local tonnage, or way tonnage, serving the industrial plants that had grown prosperous and great because of the transportation facilities afforded by the canal. Only 27 per cent of the traffic on the canal was through traffic; that is, ex-Lake traffic going to New York or return. The future of the canal, its greatest usefulness, and its greatest return to the State that spent so much energy and treasure in building it, will come from the development along the new location of new and thriving and prosperous industry. With freight rates increasing and the cost of coal mounting, the State can offer to new industries both cheap water transportation and cheap electric power from the St. Lawrence development to locate along the banks of the new canal. Could there ever be a more auspicious combination? Through traffic brings little revenue to the State, but the industries that would grow up with cheap transportation and cheap power would give the State a great return.

OUR RAILROAD FACILITIES NOW INADEQUATE—REMOVE RAIL AND WATER COMPETITION.

The railroads are not now and have not for years been able to cope with our growing transportation demands, especially for grain and farm products in season. It is also quite evident that our railroads can not increase the transportation facilities without enormous and almost prohibitive cost in carrying charges. This project will be, as the Hon. Herbert Hoover said, a "real benefit to our railroads in giving them a better average load without the cost of maintaining the surplus equipment and personnel necessary to manage the peak load during the fall months." We should not have competition between the railroads and our inland waterways, but sympathetic cooperation. Indeed, we must supplant destructive competition between railways and waterways by a program of constructive cooperation. There is plenty of room for growth and expansion of railways in legitimate territory void of inland waterways. The whole country, the producer and the consumer, should have the benefit of the full and complete development of both railways and waterways through cooperative harmony. [Applause.]

PRESENT CONGESTION OF RAILROADS AND TERMINALS.

Proper development of inland waterways will do away with the freight blockades and terminal congestions which now almost paralyze the traffic from the great interior to the seaboard ports. It will eliminate much of the transfers of cargoes and congested terminals which now often equal in cost the entire line haul. Listen to this remarkable statement made by Mr. G. W. Mooney, secretary-treasurer of the Seaboard Steel & Manganese Co., of New York: "When a car of freight starts from Chicago to New York City it has, in point of time and cost, accomplished just half of its journey when it reaches Trenton, N. J.," due to the overburdened railroad traffic and congested terminals in New York Harbor. Thousands of freight cars, loaded with grain and flour, have stood on sidetracks in eastern cities days and weeks and often months without being moved, due to congested terminals. A high authority has said that it is well within the realm of probability that, if we have the average crop or better for 1920 and an average production in our industries in the area of the great Western States, these States will lose for lack of adequate transportation facilities a sum equal to the sum it will cost the United States for her one-half of the cost of the improvement of the St. Lawrence project. These facts should arouse our Nation to her obligation and duty. Our Nation must address herself most vigorously to the development of our inland waterways transportation, and while I voted for the rivers and harbors bill for the fiscal year of 1921, curtailing all new projects for the coming year—because of the slogan of retrenchment and economy and because of the further fact that sufficient appropriations are now available to do all that is possible on new waterway projects the coming year—I am ready to say now that this Nation must realize that real economy lies in a sane and proper improvement of our inland waterways and that ample appropriations for their development is in the line of true economy and national prosperity. We must have added routes at once. The cheapest to construct, the largest in carrying capacity, and the lowest in freight cost is by the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence River to the sea. The neck to the entrance of New York Harbor is full to its limit. It can hold no more. Embargoes have occurred even in normal times, and we all recall the almost complete embargoes on traffic in 1918 and 1919. Let the American Mediterranean, nature's highway of our Nation, assist our growing commerce and needed production.

WESTERN CITIES AND LAKE PORTS, SUCH AS THE TWIN CITIES AND TWIN PORTS AND CHICAGO, HANDICAPPED.

The Hon. Julius H. Barnes, of the United States Grain Corporation, says:

From the time the grain commences to move the western railroads will always have an inadequate car supply. Now, if the cars with export grain ended their trip at the western Lake ports, they need not leave the owners' lines. The normal balance of car supply would be preserved and all business would be relieved by more equal and just flow of car service.

It is a well-known fact that the Minneapolis grain and flour market has been tremendously handicapped the past season for want of car service. It has had to carry on hand for months in storage the surplus supply ready for shipment and needed in the eastern and world markets. The St. Lawrence water route offers the only sure relief for this almost intolerable annual handicap to our great Western States in transporting their surplus of golden harvests to the world markets.

Recent reports from the Federal reserve bank of Minneapolis show that the car shortage is acute in the Northwest territory, and that commercial banks are carrying paper that should have been liquidated months ago. Sixty thousand cars are needed at once to carry last season's grain crops now stored in country elevators in the Twin Cities and western terminals.

The collapse of the transportation facilities of the country, particularly of the railroads and the larger eastern ports, has brought these great Western States to a position of feeling strangled because they have no direct outlet to the sea. The extent of this congestion may be indicated by the comparison of the number of tons of freight in the three principal railroad districts of the United States. In the western area a little less than 600,000,000 tons, in the southern area about 300,000,000 tons, while in the eastern area 1,132,000,000 tons of freight were carried in 1918. The railroads and the ports are no longer equal to this load, and the cost in delays and actual outlay of expense has become so great and acute that the Western States now demand a free access to the sea.

INDUSTRIAL DECENTRALIZATION NEEDED.

Our country should become more and more industrially decentralized, because of the tremendous distances of our transportation hauls. The raw material should be manufactured into the finished products, as far as practicable, within its own geographical zone or circle of distribution. In other words, we should not go east with the raw materials and then ship them back as finished products to the west. Neither should we ship west the raw materials and then ship them back east as finished products. We must reduce carrying charges by a sane policy of conservation in manufacture and distribution of raw materials into finished products.

POSSIBLE ROUTES AND PROBABLE COST.

In a broad way, there are three possible routes from the Great Lakes to the sea—one all American, one all Canadian, and one joint American-Canadian. From every point of view, the joint American-Canadian route down the St. Lawrence along the international boundary line is the only logical, practical, and economical route to construct. For it is evident that if Canada should build, as she certainly will do, an all-Canadian route, America would be compelled to do likewise, and the duplication of cost of construction and expenses of upkeep of two routes would have to be borne by our commerce and paid by our producers and consumers, which should be avoided.

From a military point of view the joint route is the only correct one for America, as we then would continue to have, as now, absolute joint control over all war vessels entering the Lakes from the sea. Independent routes might place either Government in a position of military suspense and in an attitude of feeling called upon to provide military fortifications and defenses upon the Great Lakes, which we fervently hope may never obtain. For over a hundred years the only line of defense and fortification between Canada and the United States has been an imaginary boundary line. May it ever continue to be so. [Applause.]

From authentic sources I find the following interesting figures: Cost of the Soo Canal, connecting Lake Superior with Lake Huron, about $32,000,000; cost of the St. Clair Flats and the Detroit River, connecting Lake Huron with Lake Erie, about $16,000,000. The cost of the Welland Canal now under construction, connecting Lake Erie with Lake Ontario, a distance of about 25 miles just above Niagara Falls, is estimated at $75,000,000. The cost of the route from Lake Ontario through the St. Lawrence River to the sea is estimated at about $120,000,000. This includes the development both of transportation and water-power facilities on the St. Lawrence River.

SOME OF THE ARGUMENTS ADVANCED BY OPPONENTS OF THE PROJECT AND THE ABSOLUTE REFUTATION BY EXISTING FACTS.

Some of the arguments already heard against this great national project may be briefly alluded to with profit. They say that it will be a dismal commercial failure; that there will be no tonnage carried over the waterway; that it will destroy the traffic on the magnificent barge canal already constructed at an approximate cost of $160,000,000; that it is not feasible from an engineering point of view; that the power to be developed is not needed; that its cost is too great to be commercially profitable; that it will expose our interior and its ports to the perils of a possible invasion by British men-of-war.

Every one of these arguments is, in my humble opinion, utterly puerile and provincial and without any sound foundation based on facts. The first two reasons assigned can not both be true. It is perfectly clear that the enterprise can not be both a commercial failure and a dreaded rival of the barge canal and Atlantic seaports. The opposition evidenced in some newspapers both in New York and Montreal proves that it will be a commercial success. Assistant Secretary of the Interior Vogelsang suggests that in place of destroying the barge canal it is conceivable that by its added water power its tonnage will be increased by reason of additional industry and commerce in its own sphere. Our best conservation engineers state that in our conservation program we need the power developed, and that the power alone will more than pay for the entire cost of the route.

They also estimate that six to ten million tons of traffic will at once flow through this route to the sea. The argument of prohibitive cost fails when we observe that the barge canal, costing $160,000,000, with a carrying capacity of 10,000,000 tons, only carried in 1919 a total of 842,000 tons of freight, while this proposed project, costing only $120,000,000, will be capable of carrying the tonnage of the Great Lakes, besides giving $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 annually in water-power rental, and a saving of 25,000,000 tons of coal, or about $100,000,000, annually.

The naval terror can be dismissed as a mere nightmare and bugaboo, which will neither scare nor delude any well-informed citizen. Hostilities with Canada, our friend and neighbor to the north, is well-nigh inconceivable. Such a situation would mean that both Christianity and civilization, as well as good American sense, had completely broken down. Over 100 years without a fort or a gun along our 4,000 miles of international boundary assures us that we can build in perfect faith and peace. Moreover, our joint route is our real protection. Powerful land guns could destroy in a moment's notice all enemy naval possibilities if along the international boundary line. Closer international business relations will tend to bind us closer as friends and neighbors.

The scholarly, eloquent, purposeful, and thoroughly patriotic American-Canadian, the Hon. J. A. MacDonald, editor of the Toronto Globe, spoke for the United States as well as for Canada when he said:

> Our message here to-day, spoken by two voices, one from the United States, the other from Canada, is one message. It is America's message that on this continent, between two proud peoples, the barbarism of brute force has long yielded to civilized internationalism. It is the assurance that Canada's national standing on this continent binds the British Empire and the American Republic in one world-spanning English-speaking fraternity.

[Applause.]

INCREASED PRODUCTION AND THE RAILROAD CRISIS.

We talk much these days about increased production, but let me ask you how you can increase production without increasing transportation? The great James J. Hill, the empire builder of the West, said 10 years ago concerning transportation that "the crisis has already arrived." He also said that we would need to add annually $1,000,000,000 for railroad expansion. Railway experts tell us to-day that we must have $2,000,000,000 annually as our minimum need. These figures are staggering. The freight and passenger rates necessary to sustain such huge investments will tend to strangle real production. Cheaper transportation of heavy freights must be found. It is found at our very door. Open the locks of the great American Mediterranean. Let us have the proper vision and the needed courage to improve and utilize the natural highway offered as the only solution. Unless we properly improve our inland waterways we will fail to function as a great and growing Nation and fail to meet the ever-increasing demand for cheaper transportation for our constantly increasing production and expanding commerce.

Listen to these amazing figures: In 1900 our railroads in the United States carried 1,863 tons of freight 1 mile for every person in the Nation. By leaps and bounds these figures increased until in 1910 the total was 2,773 tons and in 1918 about 3,871 tons. In 1916 we hauled 340,000,000,000 ton-miles of freight and in 1917 we hauled 400,000,000,000 ton-miles of freight. Each year our traffic will increase these enormous figures. President Howard Elliott, one of the great experts on railroad matters, gives as our railroad needs in rolling-stock equipment for the next five or six years the almost staggering figures of 600,000 new freight cars, 20,000 new locomotives, and 20,000 new passenger cars. These totals translated into cost figures would read as follows: Six hundred thousand freight cars, at an average cost of $2,500 each, $1,500,000,000; 20,000 locomotives, at about $60,000 each, $1,200,000,000; and 20,000 passenger cars, at about $15,000 each, $300,000,000; or a grand total of $3,000,000,000 for rolling-stock equipment alone for the next five or six years. This says nothing about steel, terminals, betterments, and the various other railway improvements and extensions absolutely essential, so that the statement that $6,000,000,000 as the necessary need for railway development is easily within the realm of truth and reason. Compare these stupendous figures with the cost of the St. Lawrence project, which is estimated to cost about $120,000,000, of which $60,000,000, or one-half, would be our contribution.

The one practical problem before us is, Can freight be carried cheaper by water than by rail? An illustration of the difference in cost by water and rail may be given as follows: A horse with a wagon on a good road can haul at 3 miles an hour 2 tons. One horsepower with a car on a steel tramway can haul at 3 miles an hour 15 tons. One horsepower in a boat with no current can haul at 3 miles an hour 105 tons. Therefore we had before the war average rail rates of 7 mills per ton-mile; average canal rates, 2 to 3 mills per ton-mile; average ocean rates, 1 mill per ton-mile; and average Lake rates, $\frac{1}{10}$ of a mill per ton-mile.

COAL CONSERVATION.

Competent engineering data tell us that the total horsepower development of the United States is about 40,000,000 horsepower. Of this total, 30,000,000 horsepower is of steam, 8,000,000 of it is hydro, and 2,000,000 of it is gas. As horsepower by steam means consumption of immense quantities of coal, it soon becomes apparent that as a Nation we should now address ourselves most vigorously to the great problem of the utilization of our water powers wherever possible. Electricity for our industries and factories, our street railways, and even in many places our railroads is a vital economic factor in our program of constructive conservation.

America must economize in her coal resources if we are to be fair and square with our posterity and if we are to give a proper amount of export to other needy nations. We are told that the consumption of bituminous coal in America alone has grown to 580,000,000 tons in the last year. The coal shortage, by reason of strikes and collapse of our railway transportation in the last two years during peak seasons, has emphasized most forcibly the need of utilizing all possible water power and all possible waterways in our country. The St. Lawrence River, with its millions of horsepower, would mean much in this program of conservation. Indeed our great task in the coming years is in discovering the "vital economies in the generation of heat, light, and motive power." We must learn how to "hitch up America's coal and America's water power." In so doing we shall attain our highest efficiency and service and the largest economy in our natural resources.

When we realize that coal is about one-third of the total tonnage carried by the railroads, we are forced to see the absolute need in reducing this load by water routes. The utilization by the eastern seaboard of the United States' one-half, amounting to 882,000 horsepower to be supplied by the St. Lawrence River, would mean a saving of millions of tons of coal every year. The annual income rental of this immense horsepower on the American side alone would be about $12,000,000, which is equivalent to a return of 20 per cent on the investment. This huge return is astounding, and the amazing thing is that this great water power has not already been developed and utilized. It is to be hoped that we will hesitate no longer to join Canada in its development. Particularly is this true when we are told by the most competent engineers that the project is perfectly feasible and that the return on the water power alone, leaving out all the advantages of transportation, will more than pay for the entire investment.

Courageous and far-sighted Canada, with a population of less than one-fifteenth of our own population, and with an estimated national wealth of less than one-twentieth of our national wealth, is ready to join hands with us on a fifty-fifty contribution basis to develop this marvelous water-power and navigation project. The United States must not and will not hesitate.

The region, in the very heart of the Nation, tributary to the Great Lakes, with but one-third of the Nation's area and population, produces about one-half to seven-eighths of the principal staples, excluding cotton and tobacco. It provides our surplus of wheat, meats and dairy products, and leading minerals. It produces 75 per cent of the wheat, 65 per cent of the corn, and 100 per cent of the flax; 85 per cent of the iron; 39 per cent of the copper; 74 per cent of the zinc, and 46 per cent of the lead, and 50 per cent of the potatoes and sugar beets. It possesses more than 50 per cent of the Nation's cattle, swine, and dairy cows; 60 per cent of the horses, and 72 per cent of the Nation's measured coal reserves.

From a study of these tables it will be observed that 12 of these States produce $1,138,000,000 worth of slaughterhouse products out of $1,652,000,000, the total production of the United States. Three States alone produce $117,000,000 worth of rubber goods out of a national total of $223,000,000. The automobile industry of this area produces $540,000,000 of the Nation's total output of $632,000,000, or 87 per cent. The production of butter, cheese, and condensed milk is $242,000,000 or about two-thirds out of a total for the United States of $364,000,000. Agricultural implements, $133,000,000 out of a total of $164,000,000 of the Nation, comes from this area bordering on the Great Lakes. In the censes of manufactures for 1914, the last authentic figures, we find that $9,000,000,000 out of a national total of about $24,000,000,000 worth of manufactures, or more than a third—37½ per cent—of America's production came from the cities tributary to the Great Lakes.

But the strictures of high transportation costs are making themselves felt. The grain areas of the Northwest are actually falling off in production because of the higher cost of going over to the systems of intensive agriculture with fertilizers on this once virgin land. The cost of intensive production plus the present high freight rates to the open sea will make it impossible for the farmers of this great area to compete with countries of virgin soils and cheap labor, such as Russia and Argentina. It is an economic axiom that the total cost is the cost of production plus the cost of transportation. The farmer receives only that amount which is left from the world's market prices after deducting the cost of transportation, including middleman's profit. Any expedient that will lower the cost of transportation and cut out the rehandling with its large costs and cut down the percentages of the commissions and profiteers will leave the farmer a greater reward for his labor and the consumer a more equitable standard of living. Free access to the sea for the western and middle-western farmers would give them a much larger portion of the prices paid in the world's market for their products. The effect on the manufacturer would be to lower his ultimate cost in the world's market. By lowering prices he would increase his sales and his production, which in most industries result in lower cost of production in his own factory. Thus a great benefit would result in the reduction of the high cost of living to the American consumer and the American producer, including the farmer, the manufacturer, the laborer, and the employer.

PRESENT BARRIERS TO THE ROUTE EASILY REMOVED.

With only two barriers removed, even the present depth of channels and harbors of 21 feet will enable large numbers of ocean vessels to steam directly to the ports of the Great Lakes. The two barriers are the St. Lawrence River rapids and the Niagara Falls. The barrier of the Niagara Falls is already being overcome by the Canadians in the reconstructed Welland Canal. The difference of lake level will be overcome by seven locks in the new Welland Canal in a distance of 25 miles. These lock chambers will be 1,000 feet long, 80 feet wide, and will have lock sills sunk to a depth of 30 feet, that will permit the passage of vessels of 28 feet draft when the channels are dredged to 30 feet. From the Welland Canal to the foot of Lake Ontario there are 160 miles of straight sailing and then open navigation in the wide St. Lawrence River. Out of the total of 182 miles to Montreal, there are 19 miles of improved channels, with at present 46 miles of canal. With this project, with dams and six locks of 800 feet in length, 80 feet in breadth, and a possible depth of 30 feet with slack water, midstream navigation would reduce the total canal and lock navigation to 20 miles or less.

The proposal is to build dams across the river with locks in the dams. Vessels navigating the river will not pass through narrow canals around the rapids, as they do now in the present 14-foot Canadian canals, but will sail majestically down the center of the stream in slack water produced by the dams and pass from level to level through the locks. Assuming that an ocean vessel has passed through the Lakes to Superior or Duluth and has loaded a cargo of western grain and is sailing for Liverpool, the first leg of the journey, the length of Lake Superior, will be 383 miles of open navigation. Then comes the St. Mary River, 63 miles long. This is all open navigation, except 33 miles, which is improved river channel and a canal 1.6 miles with one lockage. Past this restricted channel the vessel will have 220 miles of free sailing through the deep water of Lake Huron. It will then pass 27 miles of open navigation and 13 miles of restricted channel in the St. Clair River, 13½ miles of open and 3.5 miles of restricted navigation in Lake St. Clair, and 22 miles of open and 9 miles of improved navigation in the Detroit River. Again, it will have free navigation on the great expanse of deep water of Lake Erie for 219 miles. It passes 25 miles of the Welland Canal, with its seven locks, and then has 160 miles more of deep water and open navigation across Lake Ontario. It has 182 miles from Lake Ontario to Montreal, but of this distance only about 20 miles are canal navigation. At present there are 46 miles of canals, but in the proposed improvement, with slack-water navigation behind the dams, there would be less than 20 miles of restricted channel. Down the St. Lawrence River to Belle Isle, a distance of 1,003 miles, ships navigate regularly to-day, and the route offers no great obstacles during eight months of the year. From Belle Isle to Liverpool there is, of course, the ocean crossing of 2,186 statute miles of open navigation, which makes a total of 4,529 statute miles from Superior to Liverpool. Less than 74 miles of improved channel and 50.1 miles of canals would interrupt full-speed steaming from Superior, Duluth, Milwaukee, or Chicago to England. The barriers that now separate the farms and cities of the great West and Middle West from the ocean can be overcome by channels not as long nor as difficult to navigate as the Panama Canal, the Kiel Canal, or the Suez Canal, and would cost only a fraction of the expense of construction. We say remove the barriers and open the locks to the great American Mediterranean.

THE MEDITERRANEAN AND BLACK SEA COMMERCE IS A PRECEDENT FOR OCEAN-LAKE NAVIGATION.

In the discussion of this topic I desire to give due credit for facts and figures to Dr. R. S. MacElwee, Assistant Director of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, author of "Ports and Terminal Facilities," a book every person interested in this great project should read.

The opening of the St. Lawrence River will make of the Great Lakes a second Mediterranean and Black Sea system or a second Baltic system. By taking New York, Gibraltar, London, and Montreal as corners of an ocean quadrilateral it will be found that the distances between New York and London, New York and Gibraltar, and Montreal and Gibraltar are about the same, but that Montreal and London are about 500 miles closer together than New York and London. Commerce coming out of the Great Lakes area, or the Mediterranean and the Black Sea area, or out of the Baltic area, are all within almost equal distances, except the leg of the quadrilateral between Montreal and London; that is, from Montreal to Odessa or from New York to Odessa is about the same distance. On the other hand, the distance from Montreal to Superior or Duluth is only about half the distance from Gibraltar to Odessa. It is difficult to note the true distances on the usual map on the Mercator's projection. These relations are clearer on an interrupted homalographic projection or on a polar hemisphere.

The territories served by Odessa and by Superior or Duluth are essentially similar. These ports serve an enormous wheat-producing area that is capable of carrying many times its present population and affording, through the development of the prosperity and purchasing power of its peoples, a tremendous market for manufactured products. Before Russia collapsed—that is, before the Great War—London and other English seafaring centers found a very profitable trade in shipping from London through the Strait of Gibraltar to Odessa. Similar conditions will exist in shipping from New York past Montreal to Superior or Duluth or Fort William or Port Arthur. The distance from Liverpool to Gibraltar is only a few miles less than from New York to Montreal. Distances from London to Helsingfors, Finland, and other ports on the Baltic are quite similar to the distances from Montreal to the head of the Lakes. By passing through about 51 miles of the Kiel Canal the conditions of navigation are similar.

If it has been found profitable for centuries to send ships from the North Sea and north Atlantic coast of Europe into the Black Sea or into the Baltic, is it not reasonable to suppose that ocean-going ships will go into the ports of the Great Lakes?

The present controlling depth of channels and harbors throughout the Great Lakes is 21 feet. Is there enough ocean tonnage in the world, drawing less than 21 feet, to encourage the belief that the number of ocean-going vessels on the Great Lakes will be considerable? The present type of ocean vessels of 21-feet draft is 4,500 to 5,000 deadweight tons carrying capacity and a length of 335 to 350 feet, with a speed of 10 knots. It will be recognized that this is the handy small ship that was built in great quantities by the Emergency Fleet Corporation during the war. Statistics show that the average deep-load draft of these vessels is 22 feet, or only 2 feet more than at present permissible when loaded entirely full. From 1904 to 1908 there were 1,062 vessels built with an average draft of 21 feet. From 1909 to 1915 there were 1,180 vessels with an average draft of 21.7 feet. From 1914 to 1918 there were 1,345 vessels with an average draft of 22 feet. However, average drafts mean nothing to us when we are limited by a maximum of 21 feet. By taking a schedule of vessels of 22½-feet draft, we find that the average tonnage is from three to four thousand, and that of this type 1,112 vessels have been built. Whereas only 155 vessels have been built of more than 10,000 tons, 3,574 vessels have been built of from 2,000 to 6,000 deadweight tons, and most of these are vessels with full-loaded drafts of 21 to 23 feet. Many cargoes fill a vessel with less than fuel draft. It can be concluded, therefore, that most of the freight tonnage of the world could enter the Great Lakes at once without deepening channels more than they are to-day.

The six dams of the St. Lawrence and the seven dams of the Welland, and the approaching channels thereto, are designed for an immediate depth of 26 feet, and ultimately 30 feet. Therefore, practically all of the ocean cargo tonnage drawing up to 25 feet could enter Lake Ontario and Lake Erie to within 35 miles of Detroit without further dredging. An examination of the ports of Oswego, Buffalo, Erie, Rochester, and Cleveland will indicate that only very short distances need to be dredged a few feet deeper than at present in order to accommodate at all of these ports vessels drawing 26 feet, which means most of the world's cargo tonnage.

The question arises, Will the cost of operating these expensive ocean-going vessels be more or less than the cost of operating the cheap Lake boats and canal barges, plus the cost of transfers at Buffalo and New York? This gives occasion to some interesting figuring. A 3,000 to 6,000 ton ocean vessel will cost, according to Shipping Board figures, about $1,000 to $2,000 a day for operation, interest, and depreciation. Based on the northwest European and Great Britain trade, the actual sailing distance equal to the distance to the port of New York will bring the vessel to Erie or Cleveland on the Great Lakes, allowing for 18 to 24 hours lost time in passing through the 45 or 60 miles of restricted channels and the locks. For every day further than this we must add $1,000 to $2,000 operation, as compared with $600 for the Lake vessel. To the Lake vessel's expense account must be added $1 a ton for transfer at Buffalo, plus the time of the vessel at Buffalo in transferring the freight to the canal boat, including the time of the canal boat during transfer, plus the time it takes the canal boat to get to New York. If there are no other charges involved, it would seem that the ocean freighter could get a considerable distance into the Great Lakes before the margin of advantage of carrying the shipment without breaking bulk over a 500-mile shorter ocean route would be overcome by the higher operating expense of the ocean carrier compared with the less expensive Lake and canal carriers.

Not cheap sailing, but in port expenses—not port charges and fees—but in the expense of doing business through congested Atlantic ports that have broken down under the strain of the enormous increase in American commerce is the place to look for possible savings. When it is estimated that a carload of freight from Chicago has only completed half of its travel to New York in point of time and cost after it has passed Trenton, N. J., and when it is borne in mind that from Jersey City to the vessel or warehouse in or about Manhattan or Brooklyn water front there is an additional expense per car to the railroad for performing this delivery amounting from $30 to $60 per car or $1.50 to $3 per ton. And when it is borne in mind that if the shipper is not able to route his consignment from the interior directly alongside the steamer but must land it somewhere and cart it to a warehouse and from the warehouse again to the steamer, the charges that accrue will amount to from $10 to $15 a ton; and further when it is realized that, due to the congestion and delays and numerous strikes at the port, a vessel may be held there on the average of from 10 to 15 days at an expense of from $4,000 to $5,000 a day to do a job of discharging and loading that should not require more than 5 days at a small, or well-equipped terminal, it will be seen that the cost of operation for a few hundred miles of comparatively open sailing through the Great Lakes to a port where the vessel will receive dispatch without congestion—the matter of this increasing expense of navigation—is very small, indeed, compared to the great saving to the steamship company, the shipper, and the railroad company. The nature and amount of these savings seldom occur to the mind of the public. These savings will almost remove the economic Chinese wall that is preventing the Middle West and great Western States from realizing their full development. [Applause.]

WATER POWER AVAILABLE FROM THE CANALIZED ST. LAWRENCE AND THE DEMAND FOR POWER IN NEW YORK AND NEW ENGLAND.

The mean annual flow of the St. Lawrence River at Ogdensburg, N. Y., based on records from 1860 to 1917, is 241,000 second-feet. Since the fall in the 62 miles of the river from Tibbets Point, at the foot of Lake Ontario, to Odgensburg is but 1 foot, and since Galop Rapids, the first of the series of rapids in the river, are but a few miles below this city, Ogdensburg may be considered as the head of the St. Lawrence River.

The fall from Lake Ontario to the level of Lake St. Francis at St. Regis, N. Y., at the northern boundary of New York State, is about 92 feet. This stretch of river, extending about 113 miles along the international boundary, may be designated as the international portion of the river. In this stretch of the river there are a number of rapids. The more important are Galops, Plat, Farrans Point, and the Long Sault.

The portion of the river from St. Regis to Montreal, at the head of ocean navigation, lies wholly in Canada. In this 70-mile stretch of the river the fall is about 130 feet, practically all of which is concentrated in two sections of 14 and 8½ miles. The former includes Coteau, Cedar, and Cascade Rapids, in which the fall is 84 feet, and the latter includes Lachine Rapids, in which the fall is 45 feet. The lower end of the first section is about 24 miles from Montreal, and the lower end of the Lachine Rapids is at Montreal.

In considering the amount of water power available in the St. Lawrence River it is assumed that the mean annual flow will be utilized, as the elevation of the Great Lakes and consequently the flow of the St. Lawrence will ultimately be regulated. Already plans have been proposed by the Chicago sanitary district for regulating the level of Lake Erie, in order that the flow from the Chicago drainage canal may not interfere with navigation interests. If the level of Lake Erie is regulated the problem of controlling the flow of the St. Lawrence would, of course, be much simplified. The total fall from Lake Ontario to ocean navigation at Montreal will also be entirely utilized, as the plans for making the St. Lawrence navigable for ocean steamers contemplate canalizing the river by locks and dams.

The total theoretical horsepower available in the international portion of the river, based on a flow of 241,000 second-feet and a fall of 92 feet, is about 2,520,000 horsepower. Assuming that but 70 per cent of this amount could be made available on account of the inefficiency of water wheels and generating equipment, there would be 882,000 horsepower available to Canada and the United States, respectively. The St. Lawrence River Power Co. is already utilizing a flow from the river in this section equivalent to about 95,000 horsepower.

The amount of power in the Canadian portion of the river below St. Regis, utilizing the mean annual flow and the total fall in this portion and 70 per cent efficiency in water wheels and other equipment, is 2,490,000 horsepower.

The total amount of power available in the St. Lawrence River from Lake Ontario to ocean navigation is, therefore, about 4,254,000 horsepower, of which 882,000 belongs to the United States and 3,372,000 to Canada.

The question naturally arises, Will there be sufficient demand for this tremendous amount of power if it is made available?

The following table, based on census figures from 1899 to 1917, shows the total installed capacity of prime movers in manufacturing plants, central stations, and power plants of electric railways in the New England States and New York State:

Year:	Horsepower.
1900	12,270,000
1905	16,400,000
1910	21,200,000
1915	24,200,000
1925 (estimated)	30,100,000

Note that the values in this table do not include the power of locomotives, power plants of hotels and apartment houses, other small power plants of similar nature, and power plants in State and Federal institutions. These figures indicate that at the present rate of increase there will be needed in New England and New York about 3,000,000 more horsepower in 1925 than at present and that there would be a demand for all the available power of the St. Lawrence long before the power could be made available if construction should start immediately. Undoubtedly if the 4,250,000 horsepower in the St. Lawrence were available at the present time it would be very quickly utilized, for, owing to the difficulty in securing coal, a dependable and steady source of power such as the St. Lawrence would speedily replace fuel-generated power not only in the United States but also in Canada.

No consideration has been given to the demand for power in Canada, which, like the United States, is suffering from a power shortage, and it would be willing to export to the United States only the portion of the power of the St. Lawrence for which it has no market. The Province of Quebec, however, is rich in water power. The chief of the hydraulic service of Quebec estimates that there is 5,000,000 horsepower available in the rivers of the Province, not including the territory above the fiftieth degree of latitude. It may prove to be more profitable for Canada to export the St. Lawrence River power and utilize the water power of Quebec for its own use.

New England at present is having great difficulty in securing coal for its industrial and domestic use, and any increase in the number of prime movers utilizing coal for fuel only serves to make the situation more acute. A point will soon be reached, if it has not already arrived, when the industries in New England will move to fields where fuel can be easily and surely obtained or to fields supplied with reliable and dependable hydroelectric power.

Canada is rich in water power, and Quebec has many fine power sites on streams whose flow can be regulated. The flow of the St. Maurice is controlled by a reservoir having a capacity of 160,000,000,000 cubic feet, twice the capacity of the Assuan Reservoir in Egypt. By means of this reservoir, the flow of St. Maurice River, at Shawinigan, is kept at 12,000 second-feet, about twice the natural minimum flow of the stream. With such desirable water powers practically just across the boundary line from New England, it may not be long before there is an exodus of New England factories to a source of power not affected by strikes of miners or by congestion of railroad traffic. The development of the water power of the St. Lawrence will in a large measure relieve the power situation in New York and New England. Sooner or later the immense power of the St. Lawrence must be developed. So great a natural resource can not much longer be neglected, just because it happens to lie on a national boundary. If there are complications, business diplomacy must overcome them. As there is a prospective preponderance of benefits, engineering skill must adjust them. Coal is getting each year more costly to bring to the districts removed from the mines. Hydroelectric power is every year becoming more of an economic necessity. The people of the United States and Canada can not afford not to use the St. Lawrence power. If the United States refuses to cooperate with Canada in developing navigation on the St. Lawrence, Canada will not long hesitate in developing the immense power resources of the St. Lawrence, as the power shortage in Canada is more acute than it is in the United States, for Canada has not the immense coal resources which we enjoy on this side of the line.

The power necessities and the navigation interests appear to be of equal importance, and they may well be developed together, for in this instance water power and navigation dovetail together perfectly.

The time has passed when any one section of the United States should dictate our national or commercial policy. There must be balanced on the one hand the country-wide benefit which will undoubtedly accrue from a cheap transportation from the Great Lakes to the sea, and on the other hand the possible, though not probable, loss to the country through a diminution of the ports of the States and more particularly the port of New York on this side of the boundary. Advocates of the scheme come from the great Northwest and the other States west of New York, which see a cheap outlet to the sea in bottoms which can go from Montreal right to the Lake cities.

The Engineering News Record of New York says very significantly that "the opposers are those New Yorkers who fear for the prestige of the country's principal port and foresee the abandonment of the costly barge canal. New York, a year-round port, fed by the great railroad systems of the Nation, blessed by a magnificent basin of deep and still water at its very warehouse doors, has nothing to fear from the St. Lawrence waterway. There also need be no fear of the abandonment of the barge canal following the canalization of the St. Lawrence."

It has been said that canals can not run sidings into industrial plants to take and leave freight, but this situation can be met by placing the factories on the banks of the canal. With ocean navigation provided for on the Great Lakes, each Lake port becomes a seaport, thus opening up the world's markets with cheap water transportation to the manufacturers of the United States. The banks of the barge canal will eventually be lined with factories drawing their power from transmission lines reaching from Niagara Falls on the west, from the St. Lawrence on the north, from the Hudson on the east, and from the water powers of Maine farther to the east. The products of these factories will be shipped on barges through the canal west to ocean steamers at Buffalo on Lake Erie, north to Oswego on Lake Ontario, east and north through Lake Champlain to the canalized St. Lawrence, and east and south to New York.

New England and New York with their immense supply of skilled and trained labor is the natural and logical manufacturing center of the United States. The improvement of navigation which brings the market of the world to the factory doors and at the same time provides power for the operation of these same factories will be favored and demanded by those who are broad minded and who have the country's success and prosperity, as a whole, at heart. Only those who are governed by sectional animosity and can not see beyond their own narrow sphere of interests will oppose such improvement. Making the Great Lakes navigable for ocean steamers and developing the great water power of the St. Lawrence are improvements so fundamentally necessary for the industrial growth and prosperity of the United States that they will not and can not long be delayed by those who base their opposition solely on the ground that a small section of the United States may possibly be harmed by such improvements.

Brooks Adams, in his address of 1916 before the Bunker Hill Monument Association, made his appeal for social coherence of our American democracy, a coherence that can come most surely through common economic welfare. Washington was first to foresee the possibility of cohesion of West and East through his project of the Chesapeake Canal. Engineer and statesman that he was, his ideals of patriotism sought expression in a practical measure—the waterway "as a bond of union and a stimulant to coherent thought."

Mr. Adams calls attention to the fact that we owe to Washington, by Jay's treaty, the possession of the western posts which made possible the other pioneer route between West and East, the Erie Canal, a competitor of his own canal. Would Washington with his vision of the need of giving the West an outlet to the sea hesitate to indorse and to promote this later development of a waterway, even though it might seem to parallel the Chesapeake & Ohio and Erie Canals?

Every bond of economic union is needed to make America coherent. The industrial East, the agricultural South, and the agricultural and mining West need to be tied together by the perfected machinery of distribution that gives to each region its best market and makes interdependence conscious and thus an incentive to social and political integrity and solidarity. The network of rails is as vital to the united country as the arteries to the human body, but if the demands of easy circulation have come to exceed the capacity of these railway arteries the health of our great country may well be protected by adding to the coordinated system of transportation every waterway that can serve this end.

When 14 great States feel the need for better distribution of the products of their farms, factories, and mines, it should be the concern of the other 34 States to unite in promoting whatever measure will accomplish that end. The St. Lawrence waterway may be international in its geographic setting, but in its economic bearing it is truly national. President Washington would have seen in it not simply an aid to a section of the country but a further contribution to the common welfare of the Nation.

My most earnest plea to Congress is that we shall stand for a square deal to the great Middle West. Remove the barriers. Open the locks. Create the American Mediterranean. Increase production. Enhance America's commerce. Above all, may we ever stand a united people for one all-persuasive American ideal for a national mind, a national will, and a national conscience, ever defending law, justice, liberty, home, intelligence, and religion, the enduring pillars of our Nation's life and America's progress. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, after listening to the very interesting address of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON], of course, the few minutes allowed me will not enable me to say very much in answer. But ninety one-hundredths of all he said does not apply to the situation. I am going to ask you to listen to a few practical remarks from a fellow who has listened to all that has been said on this subject for years and years. When the barge canal was proposed, the whole question was gone over as to whether ships could go all the way up, because there was a thought of building a ship canal, if it could be done. After several years of examination by engineers and others, the conclusion was arrived at that there were three classes of successful vessels to do three kinds of work on the different parts of the route. The first type of vessel was the great ocean steamer with a narrow, sharp bottom, built tremendously heavy in order to stand the storms of the Atlantic. Her cost was so high that she had to run between here and Europe in a few days to make her profitable. That was because the overhead expense was so high. Then a boat is required to go up through the canal, and another to go through the Lakes. We discovered that the same boat could not profitably go through the canal and also navigate the Great Lakes. The lake vessel is built with a comparatively flat bottom, and built comparatively light, because 20 feet is the draft on the Lakes in all the ports, while 20 feet would be the draft of a great ocean steamer when she was light, with scarcely any cargo at all. They could not figure that even this flat-bottomed boat for the Lakes could successfully come from Chicago to New York, but that an intermediate vessel, a barge, something cheaply built, was required for the canal. An ocean steamer costs several hundred thousand dollars. A lake vessel costs half, or perhaps a third as much, while the little barges before the war could be built for five or six thousand dollars. They cost a little more now on account of the high cost of everything, but only a few thousand dollars.

These vessels receive the cargo and bring it down cheaply through the canal, going slowly, where an ocean vessel could not go at all. I have been over every foot of the route the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON] explained, and from the foot of Lake Ontario to Montreal, where the rapids are, I have traveled that distance on vessels. To enlarge the canals around those rapids would involve a tremendous expense. The Canadians have been running that route in an economical way since the country was discovered. The Canadians run down with barges to Montreal and then put the cargo into vessels, because Montreal is as high up as ocean vessels can profitably run. So they run down to Montreal in cheap barges, and in the same way in American water they run down through the Lakes, and then transfer to these cheap barges, to carry the cargo down to the ocean port.

I heard the gentleman from Wisconsin say something about what Washington would do. Just imagine George Washington ever entering into a conspiracy against the commerce of his own country.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLEARY. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman please state what is the draft of a heavy ocean steamer?

Mr. CLEARY. The heavy ocean steamers run into New York with a draft of 30 to 40 feet.

Mr. KINKAID. What draft vessel can go through the rapids of the St. Lawrence?

Mr. CLEARY. About 12 feet, I think; something like that.

Mr. KINKAID. Then that is one of the problems to be dealt with?

Mr. CLEARY. Of course. When a large vessel goes through shallow water she has to go very slowly. Anybody who has ever ridden on a Hudson River steamer knows that when it gets above Hudson, where it runs into shallow water, the steamer runs very slowly, because she is fairly close to the bottom, and there is not room enough. If she should go fast she would carry the water with her in such a way as to bring herself on the ground, and so she is prevented from going fast. No great vessel can go fast in comparatively shallow water, and no ocean vessel will ever run successfully up the St. Lawrence River and through the Lakes. Neither will any Lake vessel run successfully to Europe. Coming down on the train the other day I talked with a man who had been on a vessel that came down the Lakes in war time. He said, "When she gets into a storm she will keel over to an angle of 45 degrees." Those Lake vessels are not built properly to withstand ocean storms. They are too flat on the bottom. So it requires three classes of vessels to do this thing properly; and there is seacoast enough that is owned by the United States between the Mississippi River and the Gulf of St. Lawrence without making ports in the Gulf of St. Lawrence for the Canadian people.

The Erie Canal was built nearly a hundred years ago. It was built to relieve the commerce of the West, and it has done it successfully. There has always been plenty of transportation to bring down the grain of the West. That was true even when the old small Erie Canal was in use. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON] said something about local commerce on the Erie Canal. I was in business on the Erie Canal for 35 years. I know that more than three-fourths of the business of the Erie Canal was through business and not local business. It was through to Chicago or through to the Lake ports.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CLEARY. Yes.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. My statements were all verified by the engineers of the River and Harbor Board and by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

Mr. CLEARY. The gentleman ought to verify them a little more. It may have been so lately, since the Government controlled the canal, but go back to 1890 and before that.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. My statement was that in its palmiest days the old Erie Canal had 73 per cent local tonnage and 27 per cent through traffic.

Mr. CLEARY. I know the gentleman is mistaken, because I was in the business. I know that by far the greater part of the business was through business. There might be a load of malt at Rochester, but by far the greater part of the traffic was grain coming down from the Lakes, and lumber which came to the canal at Tonawanda. So from a business standpoint the State of New York has attempted to help the railroads carry this traffic. The State of New York is not doing it now, because the Government took control of those canals, and there has not been time for them to build up. The old boats are rotted down, and they will not do much until the new boats are built; but, of course, as fast as new boats are built the Erie Canal can carry more grain than will come from the West, and it will not be necessary to lend Canada millions of money to build her up.

You can build up your own country without going to Canada at all in order to encourage her in cooperation with us. [Applause.]

If we take the whole ports to the south and the north, and if we can not run our commerce through our own country without going into Canada, it is something we have never had to do yet. I have not the statistics to suggest any improvement. The main thing is that it has been determined by men who have looked into it that an ocean steamer is not a successful lake steamer, nor a lake vessel a successful ocean vessel, and neither are or can be made profitable river and canal steamers over long routes, as the St. Lawrence River and the canals and dams and locks, which would have to be built on the long stretch between Lake Ontario and Montreal, where there are a series of rapids to be overcome at tremendous cost and many, many years of time necessary to complete such a route, which would then only be fit for barge navigation in order to operate profitably. [Applause.]

Now, as to Erie Canal rates, 30 to 35 years ago, in the eighties and the nineties, before any improvement had been made in the Erie Canal, rough freight in bulk and barrels was carried from New York to Chicago by canal and lake for 7½ cents per 100 pounds or $1.50 per ton. In 1886 I carried by canal and rail from New York City to Joliet Steel Co., at Joliet, Ill., 20,000 tons spiegeleisen in bulk and a similar amount the same year to Chicago, at $1.85 per gross ton, to be used in manufacture of steel. I only cite these instances to prove my assertion that canal boats and barges can carry cheaper than other vessels, because they are constructed and operated cheaper.

So with our own Erie Canal just finished, our Ohio and Mississippi Rivers in course of development, our great railroad systems reaching the ocean at Portland, Me., Boston, Mass., New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, Newport News, Charleston, Jacksonville, New Orleans, Galveston, and others, we can take good care of all business offering east or west bound without making a combination with any foreign country to the detriment of our own country, if it were possible to succeed in any such unpatriotic scheme.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the argument of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON] was based on assumptions. He assumed, first, that an ocean going route through Canada was economically feasible and practical. Second, that it was necessary in order to develop the water power of the St. Lawrence River, that we should not simply develop the water power, but that we must in connection with it improve for navigable purposes the St. Lawrence River for a stretch of hundreds of miles. He assumed, in the third place, that in order to make the American people a solidarity and make us patriotic and united within ourselves we must take in Canada in our appropriations.

Those are the three assumptions upon which the gentleman founded his argument. Let us take them in order. First, the gentleman did not at all discuss—not one word was said by him about the economic feasibility and practicability of the route which he proposes and advocates. Why, he could not find anyone who will agree with him that you can have a single boat that economically will navigate the ocean, canal, and the Lakes. He will find that economically that is impossible. He will find that the cost of construction, the interest on it, the cost of maintenance, are so great that a boat could not slow down which carries ocean-bound traffic to the slow rate at which it would be bound to travel in going through a canal. If he would take a practical example, without going to the St. Lawrence River, he would find that up the Hudson it is not navigated at all by ocean going boats, because ocean going boats find that economically it is impossible. There is something else about navigation of the St. Lawrence route. If the gentleman would investigate it, he would find that it is icebound a third of the year; he would find that it is not a question of navigating with the ordinary ocean-bound vessel; he would find that the Encyclopedia Brittanica says that they have to construct an especially strong ocean vessel to navigate the St. Lawrence River and the Gulf of St. Lawrence. He would find that they have ice; he would find that they have fog; he would find that the Canadians themselves, because the time for ice and fog exist for so long, through the greater part of the year, that they themselves have come down to an American port and established a port at Portland, Me., and that the Canadian Grand Trunk Railway has extended its lines to Portland because of these obstacles. He would find all these objections, and so would find that that route is not practicable.

Second, is it necessary in order to have a great water power on the St. Lawrence and develop it that we should improve the St. Lawrence River and make it navigable for hundreds of miles? Of course not. These gentlemen deal in glittering generalities; they do not tell you what the cost of the water power will be as one item and what the cost of improving the river would be as a separate item.

Listen to what they said in Washington at the Rivers and Harbors Congress, read their newspaper articles, and find anywhere, if you can, a statement of the items. They do not dare to face the facts, because the facts are the improvement of the water power is a tithe, a fraction, a small and insignificant part of the development of this scheme as a whole.

So, I say to you, you should not link up these two things, because we propose to develop the St. Lawrence water power entirely aside from building up the navigation of the St. Lawrence River. The two things have no necessary connection; they are not necessarily bound up together. The development of the water power will pay a splendid return, and the navigation no return whatever on the enormous outlay it will involve.

Now, let us come, gentlemen, to the third point. The gentleman says that there was a piling up of freight down at New York during the war. Why? He leads us to believe that it was because the facilities at New York are unable to meet the present demand on them. That is not the fact. The fact is that during the war there was a shortage of ships, that ships were employed for war purposes and ships could not receive the freight that was sent to New York as rapidly as they reached there, and all the piling up of material arose from that circumstance. The gentleman from Wisconsin will find that we have, as he says, a great Barge Canal leading across the State of New York. He will find, if he investigates the subject, that the Barge Canal is ready to be operated; that it has not been operated because the Director General of Railroads said that he needed all the freight for the railroads to get an adequate return on them. He will find that the Erie Canal is ample to transport the grain of the West. Why, the gentleman quoted Mr. Hoover. Mr. Hoover is an expert on foodstuffs, but I have yet to be told that he is an expert on transportation. Mr. Hoover says if we do not increase our production in the United States we will soon reach the point where we will have to import foodstuffs. So by this Canadian route you will not be answering the purposes of domestic commerce at all. Domestic commerce requires the transportation of grain by the Barge Canal, to be distributed in the great manufacturing and commercial centers of the East. That can be done by a barge canal, whereas if you take it through the Canadian route each mile you transport it you take it so much farther away from that great and thriving port, the largest port of the United States, and from the whole East.

The best commerce in the United States is domestic commerce, the commerce which pays the largest returns, the commerce which is the most profitable. The greatest part of our commerce is among ourselves and not abroad, and all that would be obliterated by the St. Lawrence route.

Then, finally, the gentleman says, in the interest of solidarity of Americanism, to promote patriotism, to make Americans throughout this Union love one another more than they have in the past, to make them present a united front, to make them ready to fight as one man, we shall do what? Why, he says, to accomplish that laudable and worthy object, in order to make the Americans on the Mississippi and on the Gulf unite with the Americans of the East and on the Pacific, we must improve Canadian waterways! Oh, lame and impotent conclusions to such glowing and promising premises as the gentleman lays down!

I say to you that the State of New York in the early days, over a hundred years ago, provided a waterway to the sea ample and sufficient to meet the demands of those days. We have now expended $200,000,000 more to modernize it and bring it up to the needs of to-day. It is ready to use, and all we need to do is to use it, and we are going to provide barges that will carry 2,500 tons to 3,000 tons, instead of 1,000 tons, as we figured when we began constructing the barge canal. The gentleman says that we are selfish in the East. Selfish in the East? Do they remember the benefits of the past? Selfish in the East, when we have provided and modernized this canal! Selfish in the East, when we provided for the traffic of the West throughout the early history of the country?

Mr. GRIFFIN. And we have done this at our own expense.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes; it has been done at the individual expense of the great State of New York. I say to you that if we are to do anything in the interest of Americanization, if we are to bind this Union of States more closely together, if we are to recognize and realize that we are to be brothers united in all the causes which the United States can from time to time espouse, we can not do it by building up a waterway in a foreign country, we can not do it by advocating the building up of Canada or any other foreign country. The country that we love, the country that we revere, the country that we want to see grow and prosper and become great is the United States of America, and not some other country, and we must realize that in time of war this joint waterway that is built with American dollars can not be used by us at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. DEMPSEY was granted leave to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield one-half a minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, on July 1, 1919, there were 759,870 civilians in the employ of the United States; 102,126 were employed in the District of Columbia and 657,744 were employed outside. I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIEGEL. The country has been repeatedly informed by high public officials that this big war machine had been reduced. The high cost of living plus the high taxes had led to the issuance of such statements. I called up the United States Civil Service Commission a few weeks ago for the purpose of ascertaining how many civilian employees were working for the Government on January 1 last and was informed that the figures had only been compiled until last July. As I have previously stated, the number given by the Civil Service Commission as employed by the Government on July 1, 1919, was 759,870. Being unable to obtain the desired information from the Civil Service Commission, I wrote to each of the departments in an effort to learn how many were on the pay roll. Some of the departments very candidly told me that their figures were not up to date.

The following figures are the latest information obtainable:

Date.	Department.	Number of employees.
Mar. 10, 1920	Department of Labor	2,414
Mar. 5, 1920	Department of Interior	5,454
Jan. 1, 1920	War Department	200,000

Mar. 2, 1920	United States Civil Service Commission	373
Feb. 26, 1920	Public Printer	5,097
Mar. 1, 1920	Department of Commerce	12,755
Jan. 31, 1920	Department of Agriculture	20,484
Feb. 27, 1920	Department of State	798
Do.	Federal Trade Commission	423
Mar. 4, 1920	Navy Department	104,422
Mar. 1, 1920	Post Office Department	291,234
Do.	Treasury Department	71,070
Do.	Federal Reserve Board	405
Mar. 4, 1920	Interstate Commerce Commission	1,785
July 1, 1919	Smithsonian Institution	462
Do.	Shipping Board	2,500
Do.	Panama Canal	110
	Members of Congress, secretaries, clerks, help about Capitol, Justices of the Supreme Court, United States Circuit Court of Appeals and district court judges, clerks, marshals, United States attorneys, assistant United States attorneys, ambassadors and others in the Diplomatic and Consular Service, staff of Congressional Library, etc., at least	6,000
	Total	726,369

It appears, therefore, that the number of those in civil life earning a livelihood through being employed by the Government is close to three-quarters of a million at the present time. The average citizen will immediately ask the question why 200,000 civilians should have been employed on January 1, 1920, in the War Department? Why over 104,000 employees should have been employed on March 1, 1920, in the Navy Department when the Navy consists of less than 100,000 men and officers, and how it is that there has been an increase in the Post Office recently.

In order that there may be no discussion as to figures given by these three departments I insert the three letters from those departments, reading as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 3, 1920.

Hon. ISAAC SIEGEL,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SIEGEL: I am in receipt of your letter of the 27th ultimo.

The latest reports of the number of employees in the service of the department are as of January 1, 1920, and they show that at that time there were approximately 200,000 people in the civil service of the department throughout the world. A very large number of these employees are serving under temporary appointment authorized by the Civil Service Commission, without competitive status required by the civil-service rules for permanent appointees, but the proportion is, of course, not known in Washington. Since that date there has been a very large reduction in the number of employees, and the reduction is still going on. In the regular service of the department the civil-service rules provide for exemption from competitive examination in the following cases:

"All cable engineers and cable electricians.

"All telegraph operators, telegraph linemen, and cable seamen receiving a monthly compensation of $60 or less serving on military telegraph systems or at military stations and who perform their duties in connection with their private business or with other employment, such duties requiring only a portion of their time. Appointment to such positions shall be subject to noncompetitive examination as to practical skill in the work required therein by a signal officer or acting signal officer, whose certificate as to the professional fitness of the appointee shall be forwarded to the Secretary of War and a duplicate thereof to the Civil Service Commission.

"Longshoremen employed by the department at ports in the United States, trade and noneducational employees in the Philippine Islands, all employees on transport ships, and, so far as may be found necessary by the department during the present war, all subclerical and nonclerical employees constituting the working forces for operating the piers at Hoboken, N. J., and at other seaports, but not the executive and clerical forces.

"All commissioners and statutory places of secretary for the national military parks and one assistant secretary to the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park Commission.

"Consulting architect for work of reconstructing the United States Military Academy at West Point, N. Y.

"All positions on torpedo and mine planters and cable boats, both navigating and operative, of the Quartermaster Corps of the Army.

"One law officer in the Bureau of Insular Affairs.

"One superintendent, one chief chemist and assistant superintendent, and one first assistant chemist for service in connection with the operation of the Washington filtration plant under the Engineer Department.

"Caretakers of abandoned military reservations or of abandoned or unoccupied military posts, when the positions are filled by retired noncommissioned officers or enlisted men.

"Civilian professors, instructors, and teachers in the United States Military Academy at West Point.

"Superintendent of construction, Quartermaster Corps, Corregidor, Philippine Islands.

"Contract surgeons.

"Clerk qualified as translator of the English, Spanish, and Tagalog languages in the Bureau of Insular Affairs.

"Watchmen on fortifications under construction and watchmen at warehouses, depots, wharves, and piers belonging to or controlled by the War Department, when the positions are filled by men who have served at least two enlistments in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps.

"All persons employed at the experimental factory of the equipment division of the Signal Corps at McCook Field, Dayton, Ohio, for the period of the war."

Notwithstanding these exemptions a good many persons occupying such positions have a competitive status, but the number, of course, is not known. In some cases, as, for instance, at McCook Field, appointments are made without exemption, notwithstanding the provision in the last paragraph quoted.

In view of these facts, and particularly in view of the rapid decrease in the number of employees in the department now going on, you can readily see that it would be impracticable to arrive at the exact number, or even a fair approximation of the number, of employees now in the service appointed without competitive examination.

Sincerely, yours,

JOHN C. SCOFIELD,
Assistant and Chief Clerk.

Very respectfully,

F. S. CURTIS,
Chief Clerk.

Hon. ISAAC SIEGEL, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The American people have always been willing to pay taxes when they were obtaining results. It is useless for Members of Congress to be delivering speeches and making every effort to bring about economy in the operation of the governmental departments and bureaus when the heads of those departments and bureaus have not as yet awakened to the fact that the war was unofficially over on November 11, 1918. Practically no one who is in a supervising capacity has come forward with any real action on his part showing that he has endeavored in every possible way to reduce the force under him and at the same time maintain that high standard of efficiency which the Government should have at all times. The truth about the matter is that the average Government employee is underpaid, and that many of them have lost their enthusiasm for their work and do not endeavor to overexert themselves. On the other hand, there are very many men and women in the Government employ who render the most efficient service but who do not receive a living wage.

Without desiring to be deemed a partisan, I am frankly of the opinion that there will not be a dismantling of the war machine until a new administration comes into power, with new chiefs at the head of each department and bureau determined to retain those who are efficient and necessary and at the same time discharge without delay those who can be spared and who are inefficient. Economy is what is needed not only in civil but in governmental circles.

The burden of taxation is entirely too high. The same condition prevails in the States and in the cities. Unless economy is practiced the burden of taxation will become in this country pretty nigh unbearable. Let us all try to bring about the necessary changes in order that not only may we have economy in running the various branches of our country, whether local, State, or national, but also in the management of our own homes. If we would reflect and consider that there are approximately another million city, county, parish, and State employees, then the American citizenship would awaken to the condition of affairs. Many of our citizens who apparently can not find time to take an interest in public affairs will perhaps awaken from their lethargy now that it is being brought to their very doors that unless they commence to take a keener interest in public affairs their tax bills will be such as to startle them. The mere registration for the purpose of voting and then casting a vote is not all which a citizen should under his obligation of citizenship be required to do. The greater number of men and women realizing that they are owners of the Government the better kind of elected and appointed officials will we have. It is a call to patriotic service in times of peace. It shows the urgent necessity for the establishment of a real up-to-date budget system for the Government and for every community which desires to obtain the full benefit of every dollar spent from the Public Treasury.

In addition thereto, the ideal citizen is one who encourages all individuals that he comes in contact with to uphold all laws, regardless whether he believes in the justice of them; he fears no man; he is honest at all times and all places; he stands by his family, friends, and country at all times and everywhere; he does what he can to bring about the inculcation of patriotic ideas in the minds of both young and old and helps morally and financially every movement which is trying in any way to advance the mental, moral, and physical welfare of the American people. He recognizes the fact that the accumulation of wealth does not in itself constitute the success to which he should aspire. He knows that service to the community is greater than the gathering of wealth. He never forgets that it is the man or woman who leaves a good name, an unblemished reputation, and good character who is the one most thought of when the individual has passed away to the far beyond.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein as an extension of remarks an address made by George Clinton, the grandson of De Witt Clinton, who built the Erie Canal, which address was delivered before the Rivers and Harbors Congress on December 9, 1919.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by including an address delivered by George Clinton. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The address referred to is as follows:

SHIP CANALS FROM THE GREAT LAKES TO THE OCEAN.

[Address before the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, Dec. 9, 1919, by George Clinton.]

"Mr. President and gentlemen, the occasion for this address is what is known as the Lenroot amendment to the rivers and harbors bill, passed at the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress. That resolution, in substance, refers to the International Joint Commission for investigation the question as to what further improvement of the St. Lawrence River between Montreal and Lake Ontario is necessary to make the same navigable for ocean-going vessels, together with the cost. The commission is required to report to the Dominion of Canada and to the Congress of the United States, with recommendations for cooperation by those Governments in the improvement of the river. It is to be noted that this amendment is worded in view of the fact that the Welland Canal is to be improved by increasing the depth to 25 feet, with 30 feet over the miter sills of the locks, which are to be 800 feet in length and 80 feet in width, thus making the canal adaptable for the passage of our largest lake vessels. The prism is to be so constructed that it can be deepened readily to 30 feet. This, with the proposed improvement of the St. Lawrence River canals, would enable lake vessels to reach Montreal and the ocean from Duluth or Chicago, and vice versa, from Montreal or the ocean to the heads of the Great Lakes. The amendment introduced by Mr. LENROOT was further amended by extending the field of investigation of the commission to routes for a ship canal within the American territory.

"I assume that this Congress does not intend to depart from its established policy of not advocating any particular waterway improvement, but I regard it, nevertheless, as entirely proper that the question of a ship canal from the Lakes to the ocean should be discussed, as it is one of the most prominent waterway questions before the Nation to-day.

"In approaching the discussion I would premise that it presents several aspects. The great questions which are to be considered in determining the propriety of undertaking the construction of any such channel are of two classes, national and international. Also the subject has a sectional aspect—that is, to what extent the construction of a ship canal would affect, advantageously or disadvantageously, different sections of the United States, and this involves both the national and international character of the channel. Again, this vital question is presented: Assuming that the advantages and disadvantages to different portions of the United States would warrant entering upon the enterprise, would the cost of construction and maintenance be so large, when compared with the advantages, as to make the building of the canal advisable? And this involves the subsidiary question whether such a canal would be used to any great extent by either lake or ocean-going vessels.

"Discussion of these questions must necessarily be from two points of view—first, the assumption that such a ship canal is feasible and would be commercially a success, and, second, that such a canal would not be, on the other hand, feasible, and that it would not be a commercial success.

"So far as the United States alone is concerned, a ship canal from the Great Lakes to the ocean, if we assume that it would be used to an extent that would make it a commercial success, would be of great advantage for the shipment of the grain, ore, lumber, and to some extent of manufactured products from the Northwestern and Middle Western States, as the tendency would be to minimize terminal charges and lower freights. Of course, this would not be true if the canal was not a commercial success. On the other hand, if the canal should become an active and successful avenue of transportation, it would work most decidedly to the disadvantage of the States bordering the Mississippi south of Cairo, tend to prevent the great prospective growth of the commerce of the ports of New Orleans, Galveston, and other Gulf ports, as well as those of the Atlantic ports, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Newport News, and others. This result would inevitably follow, because rail, lake, and river transportation of bulk freights, and to a less extent of other freights, would be diverted from their present channels to the St. Lawrence route, with Montreal and European ports as terminals. A direct effect would also be to greatly injure the commercial prosperity of the great Middle and Eastern States, for the same reasons. Under these circumstances it is a very pertinent question, 'Should the United States expend the moneys coming from the sections of the country last named for the purpose of aiding that section comprised in the Northwestern and Middle Western States to the great injury of the Atlantic and the other Mississippi Valley States?' The project is wholly in the interest of a section and against the interests of by far the most populous and prosperous part of the United States, exclusive of that section. We can not preserve a patriotic unity in these United States if we are to indulge in improvements for the benefit of particular sections where other sections of our country may be injured. We must be careful to adjust the application of the revenues of the country to expenditures which, while they will benefit particular sections, will not injure others and will be of general benefit to the entire country. Any other course will directly tend to dissension between the States and should not be tolerated. I may add that it would be gross injustice to enter upon any project which, while benefiting some States, would have to be principally paid for from the pockets of the inhabitants of the other States, which would either derive no benefit or whose prosperity would be actually injured. It would therefore seem that the question I have propounded should be positively and firmly answered in the negative.

"Upon the assumption—which I shall hereafter show to be a false one—that a ship canal from the Great Lakes to the sea would be a commercial success, the result would be that Great Britain and Canada would be the special beneficiaries. Freights drawn from the Western and Northwestern States, as well as from the upper Mississippi Valley, would either be delivered at Montreal or carried direct to foreign ports, instead of going south to the Gulf, to the Atlantic ports of the Southern States, to the great ports of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, or the great eastern ports of New York and Boston.

"This would build up Canada, and particularly its great port of Montreal, to the serious injury of all the Gulf and Atlantic ports of the United States. Certainly a project that would tend to have such results should be condemned by all our patriotic citizens. Freights not stopping at Montreal, but crossing the ocean, from their nature, nearly all go to Great Britain, thus giving that nation the benefit of the supposed lower freight rates on our products of the field, forest, and mine. More than this, the great mercantile fleet of Great Britain would become an invincible competitor for all our lake export trade. It would be a grand sight to see our lake ports crowded with British vessels taking on cargoes for Montreal or Liverpool. Not only would Great Britain profit by securing lower freight rates on our products, but she would be put in direct competition with our great transportation business on the Lakes. This consummation devoutly to be wished by Canada and Great Britain would have no compensatory advantage to the citizens of the United States, except so far as the transportation and sale of the products of some of our States would be increased at less cost to the producers. It would seem that there should be no division of sentiment here, and that all patriotic Americans should insist that we must not build up the prosperity of Canada and Great Britain at our own expense.

"So far I have discussed the proposition under consideration upon the assumption, for the purpose of the discussion, that a ship canal from the Great Lakes to the ocean would be a commercial success. This assumption will not bear investigation in the light of practical experience, the difficulties and expense of the undertaking, and the well-known economic rules which govern transportation. Indeed, the construction of such a ship canal would be so great a failure commercially that it would not warrant the expenditure of anything like the amount that it would cost.

"Connection of the Great Lakes with the ocean has been the dream of many men in this country. It is still a dream, for the day of dreamers has not passed. As early as 1708 the connecting of Lake Erie with Lake Ontario, as a first step toward reaching the upper lakes directly from the St. Lawrence and by that river reaching the ocean, was suggested by Cadillac. The project was rejected by the minister of Louis XIV as impracticable on account of its expense. That canal would have been the ship canal of those days, accommodating bateaux carrying about 5 tons. The idea of overcoming the falls and rapids of the Niagara by a canal was the subject of suggestion and agitation from time to time for many years. The principal result was the construction of the Erie Canal from the Hudson to Lake Erie, but the minds of some men still clung to the idea of utilizing the waters of Lake Ontario by a ship canal around the falls and rapids of the Niagara.

"The result was that in 1853 a charter for the construction of a ship canal around Niagara Falls was granted by the State of New York to Dean Richmond and others. A survey was made pursuant to this charter, the routes covered being practically the same as those suggested by the Deep Waterways Board of Engineers of the United States, as printed in its report of June 30, 1900. That canal would have been a ship canal for that day, as it would have accommodated vessels of 500 tons. The undertaking was, however, abandoned. The final outcome of all the suggestions, schemes, and undertakings for connection between the Great Lakes and the ocean by canal culminated in the rejection of all plans on the grounds of impracticability, lack of promise of commercial success, and great cost, and the solution of water communication with the ocean was found in the construction and subsequent improvement of the Erie Canal from the Hudson to Lake Erie, with a connection by way of Oswego between the Hudson and Lake Ontario, on the American side of the boundary, and on the Canadian side by the construction of the Welland and St. Lawrence River Canals. Nevertheless the dreamers still had visions of a continuous ship waterway, and, although it had been determined that the cheapest means of transportation was by lake vessels to Buffalo and by barge from Buffalo to tidewater, a board of engineers was appointed to again investigate the subject of a ship canal. This board made a report in 1897, which was very incomplete, the principal recommendation being that thorough investigation, surveys, and estimates of costs should be made. Accordingly, another board of engineers was appointed by the Government to undertake the work, and it made a report in 1900. It proposed two or three different routes from the Niagara River, around the Falls and Rapids, to Lake Ontario, and two principal routes from Lake Ontario to the Hudson, one by the way of Oswego and one down the St. Lawrence to Lake St. Francis and thence across Canada and the United States to Lake Champlain and the Hudson River. The expense was estimated at $90,000,000 for the cheapest route, exclusive of administration. It is well to notice that one of the routes from Lake Ontario east suggested by the board was wholly in American territory, but that the other was in Canadian waters and Canadian territory from St. Regis on the St. Lawrence to where the line struck the boundary of New York near Lake Champlain. This report has never been acted upon. The fact is that the idea of constructing a ship canal has been abandoned until renewed lately. It is also to be noted that the expense of construction estimated by the board was arrived at from the cost of materials and labor obtaining at the end of the last century, and that after adding at least 10 per cent to the estimates for contingencies, the cost of administration, and the increased cost of labor and materials, the expense would be to-day at least $400,000,000 for the cheapest route recommended. That at least 10 per cent should be added to all engineers' estimates for such undertaking is proved not only by the cost of construction of the Panama Canal but by the construction of the barge canals of the State of New York.

"The original estimate for those canals was nearly $50,000,000, but more careful investigation increased this amount to $90,000,000, and subsequent rises in labor and materials in the early part of this century caused further additions, bringing up the estimate to $100,500,000, to which, to cover contingencies, $500,000 was added, making the amount $101,000,000. Unforeseeable contingencies in administration and construction arose, so that in the end the barge canals cost $128,000,000. The Cayuga and Seneca Canals have cost $7,000,000, but this was not included in the original barge canals improvement.

"The solution of water transportation from the Great Lakes to the sea, so far as keeping the route wholly within American territory is concerned, was therefore found, pursuant to previous investigations as to the cheapest methods of transportation, in utilizing the Lakes and the construction of a canal that would float barges that will carry over 2,000 tons and fleets of barges that will carry the full cargo of a Lake vessel.

"Canada a few years ago took up the question of securing the Lake trade for Montreal by the construction of a canal, known as the Georgian Bay Canal, from the head of Georgian Bay by the way of French River, a series of small lakes, and the Ottawa River to that city. A large amount of money was spent by the Canadian Government in investigating this plan, together with extensive and minute surveys and the preparation of plans with estimates of cost. The result was investigation of the feasibility of constructing a ship canal connecting the head of Georgian Bay with Montreal, having 25 miles of artificial canals, 80 miles of dredging, and 332 miles of waters improved by the construction of dams, making the total distance to Montreal, an ocean port, from Duluth 1,056 miles, whereas by the Great Lakes and the New York Barge Canal the distance is 1,480 miles to the ocean at New York, a saving of 424 miles. The expense was found to vary in accordance with the difference of cost between two of the entrances into the St. Lawrence at and near Montreal, but the variance was comparatively small and the estimated cost was about $100,000,000. There were no great difficulties in this work, and the saving in distance was great, nevertheless it was found that the exigencies of navigation would cause in the end so great a loss of time in transportation and the commercial and economic objections were so great that the construction of the canal has not been deemed warranted.

"An alternative to the Georgian Bay Canal is the improvement of the Welland Canal so as to enable the largest Lake vessels to proceed to and down Lake Ontario to Kingston for the transshipment of cargoes to barges that would pass the St. Lawrence canals, which have a depth of 14 feet over the miter sills. This was determined by the Canadian Government to be the most feasible and cheapest route to Montreal. Accordingly, improvement of the Welland Canal has been undertaken, and although it has been delayed by the Great War it will be completed. The Welland Canal will be 25 feet deep, with the walls so constructed that it can be readily deepened to 30 feet. It will have 30 feet depth of water over the miter sills of the locks, which will be 800 feet long and 80 feet wide in the clear. The depths of water are figured for extreme low water. The width of the canal will be 200 feet at the bottom. Thus we find that the Canadian Government has abandoned the idea of a ship canal to Montreal and has adopted the principle simply of utilizing the waters of Lake Ontario for Lake vessels by the improvement of the Welland Canal and the use of barges on the St. Lawrence River and the St. Lawrence River canals.

"Thus history shows that the idea of a ship canal all the way from Lake Erie to tidewater is a dream which is dissipated when resort is had to a careful investigation of the commercial element of cost of transportation. I may add that this conclusion has been come to after most thorough investigation, surveys, and estimates, and in view of the cost of transshipment from large vessels to barges. There are other commercial elements which enter into the problem which I shall discuss hereafter.

"The result of the history of this movement is that further investigation of the feasibility and advisability of a ship canal from the Great Lakes to the ocean is not necessary to determine whether such a ship canal should be constructed. Such an investigation probably would do no harm, but it has not been placed in the hands of a commission of the proper authorities, for the Joint International Commission is not properly equipped, either as to the personnel of the commission or its means of investigation, to give reliable advice on this subject, unless it be by the employment of experts at tremendous expense. The Chief of Engineers, with the assistance of the Board of Engineers, could make the investigation and furnish Congress with all the information necessary to come to a correct conclusion at comparatively small expense. International questions, such as negotiating with Canada, might properly be left with the commission.

"When considering the advisability of the construction of a ship canal from the Great Lakes to the ocean, the first element to be considered is the cost. If the St. Lawrence route is to be adopted, this cost will, of course, be apportioned or divided in some way between the United States and Canada and it will be the expense of improving the St. Lawrence canals or of canalizing the St. Lawrence River. Canada, as I have shown, has adopted as the cheapest means of transportation to Montreal, an ocean port, the Lake system to Kingston and Lake Ontario and thence by barges to Montreal, and beyond question neither the Dominion nor Great Britain could be induced to change that policy by providing a ship channel down the St. Lawrence, unless for the purpose of endeavoring to control our Lake commerce and to furnish dominion over the Lakes by British war vessels in case of war.

"What the cost of altering the St. Lawrence canals to ship dimensions would be has never been estimated, to my knowledge, but it is certain that it will be extremely difficult and that the cost will be very great, running into the hundreds of millions. This is due to the topography of the river bank at the various rapids.

"The banks are not high and parts of the present canals have had to be protected by embankment or strengthening of the banks. Improvement by canalization of the St. Lawrence might be accomplished by the erection of dams at the foot of each rapid, but this would cost many millions of dollars, would flood extensive territories on the American and Canadian sides and would cause great damage by ice. This condition of affairs was gone into thoroughly at hearings before the International Waterways Commission when it was investigating the propriety of damming the Long Sault Rapids for power purposes, and it was found Canadian opposition was so strong that the commission could not recommend the undertaking of the work, although the American section rather favored it. The improvement proposed would have backed the waters of the St. Lawrence for about 9 miles above the head of the rapids and would be one of a series of dams needed in case the stream was canalized for ship navigation. But the plans presented to the commission for the dam at the foot of the rapids would not be adequate to create a ship channel and a higher dam would have to be erected and the levels of the water above it would have to be raised several feet. I think it may be almost taken for granted that, unless influenced by the motives I have stated above, Canada will not consent either to the construction of ship canals around the rapids or to the canalization of the river.

"In any event, why the Government of the United States should participate in the expenditure of an immense sum of money which would redound almost entirely to the benefit of Canada and Great Britain is impossible to see. Our people are overtaxed now and they ought not to be called upon for money to benefit a few States and our competitors for the trade of the Great Lakes.

"An element necessary to an undertaking of the project is the available routes. I say the 'available' routes, because previous surveys have pointed out what routes for topographical and economical reasons could best be adopted. One of these is the Canadian route, of which I have spoken, the improved Welland Canal, Lake Ontario, and the improvement to ship size of the Canadian canals or the canalization of the St. Lawrence River. This route is wholly Canadian. The other routes are those described in the report of the Deep Waterways Board of Engineers. Starting from the Niagara River a ship canal would be constructed around the falls on the American side. This would now seem to be unnecessary, as the Welland Canal is to be improved. Lake Ontario would then be utilized as far as Oswego and from Oswego a ship canal would be constructed up the Oswego River, connecting with Oneida Lake, which would be deepened, thence using the Mohawk route to the Hudson. As an alternative, the route would proceed down Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence to Lake St. Francis, and from near the foot of Lake St. Francis across Canadian territory to the boundary line of New York State near Lake Champlain, and thence to the head of Lake Champlain and on down to the Hudson.

"It will be observed that the line of the first-mentioned route would be in Canadian territory to Lake Ontario, if the Welland Canal was used, and in American territory if a new canal around the Falls was constructed on the American side. If the Oswego route was adopted it would be entirely within American territory through and from Lake Ontario. If the Champlain route were adopted it would be almost entirely in Canadian territory until the boundary line of New York near Lake Champlain was reached. Thus, on the Champlain route for about 200 miles navigation would be in and under the control of Canada, except the comparatively short distance around the falls, if a ship canal to Lake Ontario were constructed on the American side. I have already discussed the cost of these routes, which undoubtedly to-day would be over $400,000,000 more when land purchased and damages are added.

"The question suggests itself here whether the advantages of such a ship canal on either of these routes or on the St. Lawrence would outweigh the disadvantages. It is quite certain that no patriotic American would consent to place the control of navigation between the ocean and the Great Lakes in the hands of Great Britain and Canada, either wholly or partially. If the St. Lawrence route is adopted that control is wholly within their power. If the Champlain canal route is adopted it is within their power from a point near the head of Lake Champlain, and it would be comparatively easy for Canada to complete ship growth of Montreal as a great seaport. We all know that Montreal does not compare with New York as a commercial port and of the commerce of the ship canal to the Lakes as against the Champlain-Hudson route from the head of Lake Champlain.

"The remaining question is whether a ship canal would be warranted by the advantages as against the cost and its commercial utility. Study of this question makes it quite apparent that the expenditure of money would be largely wasted if a canal upon any of the routes was constructed, and it is certain that the commercial advantages would not be at all commensurate with the expenditure. Consideration of these propositions involves a study of the water conditions on the Great Lakes, economical transportation on the Great Lakes, and economical transportation on the ocean, as well as the objections to the St. Lawrence route.

"There are serious objections to the use of the St. Lawrence River from Montreal to the ocean for navigation by ocean or Lake vessels. These objections have been considered time and again, and they have been the most serious handicap to the growth of Montreal as a great seaport. We all know that Montreal does not compare with New York as a commercial port and we all know that it has no prospect of ever successfully competing with New York commercially. These objections are the violent cross-currents in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and the heavy fogs and ice which not only make navigation extremely dangerous but which actually raise insurance rates to a point that tells heavily against the commerce between Montreal and foreign countries and has told heavily against it in the past.

"Consideration of the condition of the Great Lakes waters has been taken up by the War Department in connection with a proposed improvement by the United States of the St. Lawrence River from Lake Ontario to the Canadian border, with a view to providing navigation facilities suitable for ocean-going ships. In 1917 the rivers and harbors act directed a preliminary examination of Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence River, with a view to the improvement stated. The examination was made in 1918 by Col. J. G. Warren, of the Corps of Engineers, and his report, dated April 12, 1918, was thoroughly considered by the Board of Engineers, approved by them and submitted to the Chief of Engineers, whose approval of the report, with all documents and communications, were submitted to the Secretary of War, who transmitted them to the House of Representatives December 16, 1918, as appears from Document No. 1591 of the third session Sixty-fifth Congress. The report and the approvals all declare that the improvement of the St. Lawrence from Lake Ontario to the Canadian border, with a view to providing navigation facilities suitable for ocean-going ships, is not deemed advisable at the present time. Col. Warren and the Board of Engineers considered various projects and give cogent reasons for not recommending the improvement, and among other things they state that even with a ship channel from the international boundary line on the St. Lawrence to the ocean by the Champlain-Hudson River route, or by the enlargement of the Soulanges, Lachine, and other canals on the St. Lawrence route, the traffic would still be governed by the depths of the harbors and connecting waters of the Great Lakes, and they refer to House Document No. 755, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, for data on this subject. As appears from that document, the deepening of the harbors and connecting waters of the Great Lakes to 25 feet, even, was reported upon unfavorably on the ground that traffic, existing and prospective, would not warrant the expenditure. It is to be noted here that deepening the harbors and connecting waters of the Great Lakes to 25 feet would not be sufficient to permit ocean vessels of a capacity compared to that of our lake vessels to navigate the Lakes and enter the Lake harbors and that our Lake vessels are not adapted to ocean navigation. We thus have the opinion of the Board of Engineers and the Chief of Engineers that the deepening of the harbors and connecting waters of the Great Lakes and the construction of a ship canal to the international boundary are not warranted by the present or prospective commercial conditions, even though the ship canal should be continued to the ocean. The conclusions of these officials were arrived at only after the most careful consideration of cost, hydraulic, topographical, and engineering elements, as well as commercial conditions. It is pertinent to ask why further expenditure of money should be indulged in when all the necessary data are at hand and come from authoritative sources. It is safe to say that over a million dollars has been expended in just such investigations and that in the hands of the joint international commission, if another thorough investigation is made, the expenditure would duplicate that already made, with similar results.

"There is another aspect of the economic question involved, which is wholly one of navigation. Great Lake vessels are practically hollow boxes, constructed for the purpose of carrying the largest cargoes possible on the lowest draft of water on inland lakes and connecting waters, construction being adapted to the comparative safety of inland navigation and the shortness of the season, which averages seven months. Lake vessels must carry as large cargoes as possible and make as many trips as possible on the Great Lakes to earn the largest profits. They average in speed 12 miles an hour on the open waters and 9 miles on the connecting waters, and they can make, at an average of 10 miles an hour, the trip from Duluth to Buffalo in about four days and from Chicago to Buffalo in about three and one-half days. In the narrow channel of ship canals, with the delay of lockage, those boats could not make safely more than about 4 miles an hour. The delay at locks may be illustrated by the use of those at Sault Ste. Marie. The average delay is an hour and a half. In the past, before the construction of the third and fourth locks, within my personal experience vessels have been delayed 14 hours. If the traffic on the ship canal is at all great, the average delay at each lock would certainly be an hour and a half, and as there would be at least 30 locks to overcome, the difference of the levels of Lake Erie and the St. Lawrence at Montreal (573 to 18 above tidewater), nearly two days would be wasted in passage one way, nearly four days on the down and return trip. If such vessels navigated a ship canal to Montreal, the loss of time between Lake Erie and Montreal would involve so great a loss of earnings that the trade would not even attract our Lake vessels, unless freights were raised to a point that would far exceed the cost of transfer at Buffalo and carriage by the Erie Barge Canal and the Hudson River to New York. If such vessels undertook to pass Montreal and proceed, we will say, to Liverpool, they would be at the mercy of the storms of the Atlantic, which they are not fit to encounter, and their comparatively low power would not make them successful competitors of ocean vessels carrying from the Atlantic ports of our country. In addition to this the higher rates of insurance of vessels and cargoes on the lower St. Lawrence would add a burden that would be almost destructive of transportation by Lake vessels from the Lakes to Europe. If our Lake vessels delivered their cargoes at Montreal, they would suffer a further loss, inasmuch as from that port they could not get the return cargoes which they now do from Lake Erie ports, and they would have to take partial cargoes, if any, through the ship canals and the increased distance across Lake Ontario to Lake Erie at a dead loss. The expense of these vessels is about $500 a day, and they must make as quick trips as possible with as large cargoes as can be had, both up and down the Lakes, and they can not spend time going to Montreal or encountering the dangers of the ocean in competition with ocean vessels.

"We may now consider ocean vessels from the point of view of utilizing the waters of the St. Lawrence River to the harbors on the Great Lakes. A typical ocean carrier, with a tonnage of 10,000, is comparable to our largest Lake vessel. It has a draft of over 27 feet and a cargo capacity of about 350,000 bushels of wheat; its speed is about 12 miles an hour. The obtaining freight on grain, New York to Liverpool, is to-day 70 to 80 cents per hundred pounds, or between 40 and 50 cents a bushel. The owners of such vessels would most certainly not engage in traffic between Montreal and the harbors of the Great Lakes, for the reason that their ocean rates are so far above Lake rates that they could not compete with Lake carriers on the Lakes without a great reduction of their own rates. It would be much more to their advantage to deliver at Atlantic ports in the United States, and much more to the advantage of shippers to ship to such ports, even by rail, certainly by the Great Lakes, the barge canals, and Hudson River to New York. Ocean vessels (as well as Lake vessels) could not navigate a ship canal even 30 feet deep with any safety without limiting their speed to as low as 4 miles an hour, in view of the danger of grounding, danger of sheering, and danger of collision with the banks, and in view of delays at the docks.

"It is impossible to imagine an ocean vessel undertaking the trip by way of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, Montreal, the River St. Lawrence, Lake Ontario, St. Lawrence Canals, and the Welland Canal in order to reach the upper Great Lakes. It is absurd to think of such vessels navigating the many miles of ship canal by the Mohawk and Oswego route or the Hudson-Champlain route in order to reach the St. Lawrence or Lake Ontario, and thence proceeding across Lake Ontario and through a ship canal around the Falls. Ocean vessels will not engage in the business of the Great Lakes, because they can not do so without sacrificing earnings and incurring unnecessary dangers of navigation in narrow and inland waters; they certainly can not engage in commerce on the Great Lakes unless the connecting waters and the harbors are deepened to at least 30 feet, something which is not to be expected, since the proposition to deepen to 25 feet has been rejected by the War Department and the Board of Engineers as not warranted by any present or prospective conditions of commerce.

"The result at which we arrive is that the commerce from Lake Erie to the ocean via any of the ship-canal routes would not reach an amount that would have an appreciable effect upon the continuance of the present method of doing business upon the Great Lakes. It follows that the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars in the construction of a ship canal would practically be a waste of money.

"The international questions involved in the subject we are discussing are of paramount importance. If we assume that the proposed ship canal will be a success, it is quite apparent, as I have already pointed out, that Great Britain and Canada will become dangerous competitors for the entire trade of the Great Lakes in connection with ocean transportation. That British and Canadian competition would be largely successful, and to that extent dangerous to the business of those engaged in our Lake transportation and to our shipbuilding interests on the Great Lakes, can not be questioned, for the ability of Great Britain, with her merchant marine and her ability to build vessels cheaply, would assure to her and Canada a large proportion, to say the least, of the Lake export and import carrying trade.

"More important still, from the international point of view, is the fact that a ship canal through Canadian waters, by the St. Lawrence or St. Lawrence-Champlain-Hudson routes, would give Great Britain absolute control of our Great Lakes in case of war or diplomatic difficulties, by placing her destroyers upon the waters of the Great Lakes. The United States could not utilize the canals for this purpose as they would be within Canadian territory. Neither could the United States prevent their use by Great Britain, under ordinary circumstances, because if disputes arose between Great Britain and the United States, British destroyers could be placed upon the Great Lakes within two weeks' time. The United States would be helpless to prevent this, for it is to be assumed that Great Britain would take the initiative without waiting for us to mobilize and invade Canada to prevent the subjection of our Great Lakes ports to Britain's navy. Thus any ship canal, except by the Oswego route, would continually exist as a menace, would fortify contention of Great Britain against the United States and would enable Great Britain to exercise coercive powers by placing our Great Lakes ports under the guns of her navy. There would be no defensive offset except to regard our lake coasts as open to Great Britain and to fortify them in the same manner and to the same extent as our Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coasts. This is not mere speculation. The danger of placing vessels of war upon the Great Lakes was recognized by the statesmen of this country in the past and it was provided against by treaty. In 1817, by exchange of notes between the United States and Great Britain, an agreement was arrived at in relation to naval vessels on the Great Lakes, by which neither power was to maintain a naval force thereon exceeding one vessel on Lake Ontario and two vessels on the other lakes, such vessels not to exceed 100 tons burden and to be armed with only one 18-pound cannon. This agreement was ratified April 16, 1818, and proclaimed by the President on the 28th day of that month.

"The danger of opening the way to Great Britain for naval supremacy on the Great Lakes has been sneered at by some of the Western papers, but their editorials disclose nothing more than ignorance and shortsightedness. We must look to the future, for the international affairs of nations are always changing and international relations in the future can never be foreseen. A league of nations and arbitration treaties are positively of no effect as preventing aggression and war when a powerful nation regards its honor as attacked or the prosperity of its people threatened by some other nation. We are at peace with Great Britain to-day, but a quarter of a century hence conditions readily may arise to cause hostility and a resort, perhaps, to reprisals, coercion or war. We must always look to the coming years and must not for fancied commercial advantage subject ourselves to a position of danger from the action of any other power.

TO SUM UP.

"1. It is entirely certain that the expenditure of an immense amount of money in a new investigation as to the feasibility of construction of a ship canal to the ocean is not necessary and not warranted, because sufficient data to determine that question already exists. The conclusion could be arrived at by the War Department, for the advice of Congress, with full data, at comparatively little expense.

"2. A ship canal by any of the routes suggested which could be adopted would not be a commercial success.

"3. If such a ship canal should be a commercial success it would redound to the advantage of a few States and great injury to the Southern, Southwestern, Middle, and Atlantic States.

"4. If a ship canal to the ocean were a commercial success it would introduce Great Britain and Canada as a dangerous competitor for the Great Lakes traffic.

"5. The construction of a ship canal that by any possibility might be utilized to a sufficient extent to warrant the expenditure of the necessary money would necessitate the United States contributing our funds and the levying of taxes upon our people for the aggrandizement of Canada and Great Britain.

"6. The construction of any feasible ship canal would necessitate its being almost wholly in Canadian territory and would place the United States in a helpless condition in case of the outbreak of war or the rupture of diplomatic relations, so far as naval domination of the Lakes is concerned, and, in case of rupture between Great Britain and the United States, would make it entirely within the power of Great Britain to place the great ports of Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, and Duluth-Superior City under the guns of British destroyers.

"From every point of view, if an investigation is to be made, it should be placed in the hands of the War Department, and it is certain that a ship canal from the Great Lakes to the ocean should not be constructed. Careful consideration of known facts will dissipate the dream of a Great Lakes to the ocean ship canal.

"Dated December 9, 1919.

"GEORGE CLINTON."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER].

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, the proposed development of this great waterway—the St. Lawrence River route—and the investigation to determine its feasibility came about as the result of a resolution which I had passed in the Rivers and Harbors Committee, and finally through this House. Competent investigators are making an investigation of this waterway to determine its practicability, men who are competent to do so. It is evident that we are going to meet with some opposition in the work from the State of New York. The statements just made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] with reference to whether this waterway can be developed or whether navigation can go ahead successfully upon this waterway will not be determined by anything he may say, it is a question that will be determined by competent engineers on both sides of the river, able men, who are well acquainted not only with the waterway but with shipping in general, and when that report is ready I think Congress will receive it and give it more credence than it will any statements that may be put forward by the gentleman from New York. The St. Lawrence River was navigated by ocean vessels some years ago by a line of boats from Chicago to Norway. I understand that the reason they had to quit navigating this river was because of the influence of the great ocean shipping combination and their ability to prevent these boats from getting marine insurance.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Yes.

Mr. CLEARY. How many tons could those vessels carry down the St. Lawrence?

Mr. GALLAGHER. I do not know; but they were doing a successful business.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Were not the greatest number of them sunk owing to the perils of the trip?

Mr. GALLAGHER. No; there were none sunk that I know of.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I think the gentleman is in error.

Mr. GALLAGHER. No; they had to cease business because they could not get marine insurance. The great boat lines running out of New York were able to prevent them from getting it, so I understand. The States of Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Iowa, Montana, Wyoming, Idaho, Colorado, and Nebraska are all interested, and I might say that the States of Pennsylvania and New York are very much interested, aside from the question of navigation, as has been explained to you by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON]; the power that is to be developed will be of great importance to these States.

There is quite a movement in the Central-Western States and beyond to bring about the completion of this great waterway; and so far as our being able to navigate it with the proper kind of ocean-going boats, I am sure that will be taken care of. The river will be improved and deepened so that ocean-going boats will be able to navigate it. The Great Lakes need this outlet, and the great savings in the handling of freights will no doubt make it pay; but very few of the boats now in oversea trade draw more than 26 feet of water and very few harbors in this country will accommodate boats requiring greater depth. New York Harbor is now overtaxed and is making a supreme effort to secure larger docking facilities. Boats are continually delayed in the harbor for lack of docking privileges, and it is only a question of time, unless some changes are made, when they will be unable to handle the shipping business of the Nation.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including an address on the development of the St. Lawrence waterway before the River and Harbor Congress at Washington, December 10, 1919, by the Hon. Alexander T. Vogelsang, First Assistant Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I suppose it is not the whole pamphlet, is it?

Mr. GALLAGHER. It is very short and quite important, and very instructive to those interested in this great improvement.

Mr. BLACK. Well, if it is short——

Mr. GALLAGHER. It is very short, and it bears directly on matters pertaining to this development.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the address:

Gentlemen of the Rivers and Harbors Congress: I have been asked to make a brief address upon the question of hydroelectric power that may be developed along that part of the St. Lawrence River constituting the boundary between the United States and Canada in connection with a proposed waterway which will accommodate ocean-borne vessels.

The advocates of this enterprise are chiefly resident far west of the St. Lawrence River, and the power feature of the work is only of incidental or general interest to them in their promotion of the navigation project, but to the State of New York and portions of New England it is a matter of extreme importance.

The Department of the Interior is charged with the administration and control of publicly owned hydroelectric power sites and has, therefore, ever kept itself abreast of the development of the art wheresoever that development may have taken place, and in the beginning I wish to give due and full credit for assistance in the preparation of this paper to the magnificent annual report of the Secretary of the Interior, just issued, and to the Geological Survey and the Bureau of Mines. Through the agencies of these bureaus the department is in daily touch with the power question, and out of its abundant researches and statistics I am enabled to present in outline some views which may create at least a conception in the average mind of the prime importance of power in our economic fabric. It is, indeed, the first among the present-day problems of science.

The development of this waterway with incidental power production is a work that appeals to our constructive imagination. It appeals to true statesmanship as defined by Jonathan Swift 200 years ago, when he said in the Voyage to Brobdingnag:

"And he gave it for his opinion that whoever could make two ears of corn or two blades of grass to grow upon a spot of ground where only one grew before would deserve better of mankind and do more essential service to his country than the whole race of politicians put together."

I may add at this point that more than a million men are now engaged in producing mineral fuels, the consumption of which expends and exhausts the stores of nature. On the other hand, the white coal of falling water is exhaustless, is everlasting. Any project that will lower transportation costs and at the same time yield energy for the use of man conforms to modern economic thought.

There is a growing tendency to redistribute those industries of the country which require large amounts of power to locations where water power is abundant and cheap. Thus, water power will control the location of those industries in which the cost of power is a large item in the value of the product.

Dr. Steinmetz estimates the theoretical maximum of hydroelectric power of the United States at 320,000,000 horsepower, though of course but a fraction thereof can be made practically available. The Geological Survey estimates the amount practically available to be 54,000,000 continuous horsepower, and of this the boundary waters in question can produce nearly 2,000,000 horsepower, half of which belongs to us.

The census of 1912 shows the developed water power of the United States was 4,870,000 horsepower. According to that census, the installed capacity of stationary prime movers was 30,000,000 horsepower, furnished by water, gas, and steam. This does not include power generated in locomotives, marine engines, automobiles, and such apparatus. The average power furnished by these prime movers was probably not more than 20 per cent of installed capacity, so that power produced in 1912 was probably not more than 6,000,000 continuous horsepower.

Seventy per cent of the water power is west of the Mississippi, and over 70 per cent of stationary prime-movers horsepower is east of that river. Thus it is seen that the East is rapidly consuming the expendable resources of power, and that if she continues to sleep upon her water-power possibilities she may soon see the transfer of many of her great industries to the enterprising, forceful, and ever-alert West.

AN INCOMPARABLE RESOURCE.

St. Lawrence River from Tibbets Point, at the foot of Lake Ontario, to deep water at the level of Lake St. Francis at St. Regis, N. Y., flows about 113 miles along the international boundary, and has a fall at low water of about 92 feet, of which about 91 feet is in the lower 48 miles, from Galop Rapids to St. Regis, there being a fall of but one foot in the 65 miles from Lake Ontario to Galop Rapids. The fall in the lower section of the river is concentrated in a number of rapids which are passed by means of canals and locks on the Canadian side. The Long Sault Rapids, with a fall of 48 feet, extend for about 12 miles along the lower end of this section.

From St. Regis to ocean navigation at Montreal there is a fall of about 130 feet in a distance of about 70 miles, of which 129 feet is concentrated in two stretches of 14 and 8½ miles, the former including Coteau, Cedar, and Cascade Rapids, in which the fall is 84 feet, and the latter, including Lachine Rapids, in which the fall is 45 feet.

It is only necessary to consider the immense amount of water flowing in the St. Lawrence River and its uniformity of flow to realize the tremendous amount of water power capable of being developed along the international portion of the river. The mean annual flow at the head of the river, as shown by records obtained from 1860 to 1917, is 241,000 second-feet. The effect of the Great Lakes, which act as a great system of storage reservoirs in regulating the flow in the St. Lawrence, is indicated by the fact that the maximum and minimum flow of the river differ by only about 25 per cent from its mean flow. A comparison of this ratio with similar ratios for the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers indicates that the flow of the St. Lawrence is remarkably uniform. The mean flow of the Ohio River at its mouth is about 500,000 second-feet, its maximum flow is about three times the mean, and its minimum flow is about one-tenth the mean. The mean flow of the Mississippi at the power plant of the Mississippi River Power Co. at Keokuk is about 50,000 second-feet. The maximum is about six times the mean and the minimum is about one-fifth the mean.

The amount of theoretical power per foot of fall in the St. Lawrence River, as shown by the mean annual flow, is 27,360 horsepower, and as a total fall of 92 feet is available in the international section of the river the theoretical power in that section is about 2,520,000 horsepower. Assuming that only 70 per cent of this energy can be made available on account of losses in head and inefficiencies of water wheels and generating equipment, this stretch of the river, owned equally by the United States and Canada, would furnish 1,764,000 horsepower, or 882,000 horsepower to each. About 95,000 horsepower of the portion belonging to the United States has already been developed by the St. Lawrence River Power Co. by means of a canal which diverts a maximum of 30,000 second-feet from the river near the head of the Long Sault Rapids through the power house into Grass River, which joins the St. Lawrence below the Long Sault Rapids. Here a head of about 40 feet is developed. After the power utilized at this development is deducted from the power of the portion belonging to the United States, the power not yet developed in that portion of the river amounts to about 790,000 hrsepower.

As a horsepower is practically three-fourths of a kilowatt, 790,000 horsepower is equivalent to about 590,000 kilowatts. This amount of power is about one-third the total installed generating capacity of all the plants engaged in producing electricity for public use in New York State, slightly more than the installed capacity of generators of similar plants in the State of Michigan, and about 75 per cent of the capacity of those in Massachusetts. In only six States in the United States does the total installed capacity of electric generators in public utility plants exceed 590,000 kilowatts.

This power may be used near the points of development by industries in which power is a large component of the product or it may be transmitted as a public-service supply to power markets that are now dependent on fuels. Doubtless neither of these courses should be followed to the complete exclusion of the other, but it is worth while to examine somewhat the conditions of public power supply within transmission distance of these sites in order to see what are the possibilities of absorbing so large an amount of power.

If the development were so made that a certain amount of regulation of stream flows by storage in Lake Ontario were possible and if load conditions were adapted to the full utilization of all the power produced, it would appear that the share of the United States of the St. Lawrence River power would be about 425,000,000 kilowatt-hours per month. The amount of power produced from fuels in public utility plants during the month of February, 1919, in New England and New York State was about 460,000,000 kilowatt-hours. The amount of power so produced from fuels during that month in the central New York region, from Albany to Buffalo, was only about 30,000,000 kilowatt-hours, so that if any considerable portion of the St. Lawrence River power were to be marketed for use by public utilities it would have to be transmitted to the metropolitan district of New York, a distance of about 350 miles. Here there is now produced from fuel at least 300,000,000 kilowatt-hours per month. Much of New England is within a transmission distance of 250 miles and requires about 150,000,000 kilowatt-hours of fuel-produced energy monthly for public service alone. The industrial plants not supplied by public-service companies use a large additional but unknown quantity of energy. The transmission of these quantities of power over the distances indicated is unprecedented but is not to be regarded as unattainable in the present state of high-tension operation. In view of these requirements, there can be no reasonable doubt in anyone's mind that there would be an ample market for all the power that can be developed on the St. Lawrence. The annual value of our horsepower would be about $12,000,000, and figured on a 5 per cent basis would show a capital value of $240,000,000.

The utilization of this power in public service to replace coal now consumed in the large manufacturing centers of New York and New England has an important bearing on the extension of the life of our coal deposits. On the basis of 3 pounds of coal per kilowatt-hour, this St. Lawrence River power is the equivalent of about 7,750,000 tons of coal annually. This is about 1.3 per cent of the total production of bituminous coal in the United States in 1918. The amount of coal consumed per year by public utility plants in New England and New York is only about 7,000,000 tons.

If, on the other hand, the demand for electrochemical and other products requiring large quantities of power increases, these water powers will give opportunity for greatly enlarged industrial development. Doubtless most of the power developed on the Canadian side, not only in the boundary portion of the river, but in the purely Canadian portion below, would be utilized for such purposes. This portion is within easy reach of the largest commercial centers, and after the St. Lawrence has been made more fully available for navigation it would be possible for ocean shipping to reach the factory sites. Assuming, as seems entirely probable, that these developments are made at low cost and can deliver power at attractive rates, it is entirely unlikely that this power can be marketed as rapidly as it can be developed.

Under normal conditions the railroads, especially those in the northeastern part of the United States, are overburdened with coal. From 35 to 40 per cent of their cargo space is given up to the transportation of coal. The full utilization of the water powers of the St. Lawrence would reduce greatly the tonnage of coal to be moved into New York and the New England States.

The saving in man power by producing energy by water power, as compared with steam power, is large, especially if the number of miners required to provide coal is considered. A large southern power company shows, by comparing the number of men needed to operate one of its hydroelectric plants on the Coosa River with the number, including the miners, needed to operate one of its steam plants, that in a waterpower plant one man is required per 5,250 kilowatts of capacity, whereas in a steam plant one man is required per 74 kilowatts of capacity.

Applying these figures to the water power available on the St. Lawrence and assuming that the 590,000 kilowatts of water power would replace the same amount of steam power, about 7,900 men would be released for work in other fields.

The power possibilities of the St. Lawrence have therefore very large economic importance, and any plans for developing the river for navigation should make provision for the maximum development of the energy that it will afford. This provision can be made only by working out a comprehensive plan in which both Canada and the United States seek the best engineering and economic solution of the problem. No doubt private capital is available to make all this improvement in consideration of a grant of the power privilege, but there is equally no doubt that this will not be done. Canada as well as the United States would not permit it.

The availability of the water power of the St. Lawrence should also receive the most careful consideration if Congress authorizes Secretary Lane's plan for a power survey of the North Atlantic industrial region.

It is now three years since Congress was urged to authorize a study of the power possibilities of the congested industrial part of the Atlantic seaboard with a view to disclosing not only the fact that a great saving in power could be effected and a much larger actual use of the power now produced could be gained but that new supplies could be obtained, both from running water and from the conversion of coal into power at the mines instead of after a long haul. The feasibility of constructing a supertransmission line of electric power paralleling the Atlantic from Richmond to Boston, affording connections at New York and Boston with the vast water-power resources of the St. Lawrence on the north and Niagara on the west, a main transmission line into which would run many minor feeding streams of power and from which would diverge an infinite number of small delivering lines tying together the separated power plants of 10 States, so that one could give aid to the other, so that one could take the place of the other, so that all may join their power for good in any great drive that may be projected, may well be investigated by the Government, not with the thought that the Government would construct or even operate such a trunk line, but that the project might so attract the attention of the engineering and financial world as to make it a reality.

Such a system of transmission lines would take from the coal mine and the railroads much of their burden and insure the operation of street lights, street cars, and essential industries in the face of railroad delinquencies.

The demand for power for the use of industrial and public utilities in New England and New York is increasing. Winter conditions like those of 1917–18 would again cause, and to a greater degree, the same difficulty that then occurred in supplying coal to the country's essential industries. The water power of the St. Lawrence would furnish sufficient energy to supply a large part of the power now generated by fuel in the northeastern part of this dominant industrial district of the United States. The demand for power in this district would undoubtedly consume all that portion of the St. Lawrence power that belongs to the United States and all of that portion of Canada's share for which there was no demand in that country.

The power production will pay the entire cost of all the work. As I understand it, our neighbor proposes to go into the enterprise on a 50-50 basis in spite of the apparent fact that the present advantage is enormously in our favor. Shall Canada's 7,000,000 people say "I will," and Uncle Sam's 110,000,000 say "I won't"? Or, shall we rather cooperate and develop this waterway, obtaining thereby, practically as a by-product, this tremendous resource of power?

A WORD ABOUT COAL.

About 55 per cent of the world's coal is in the United States. We must some day become great as a coal exporting Nation. In the prewar period we sold abroad only 4,500,000 tons of our annual production of 700,000,000 tons, which Secretary Lane visualizes in his report by stating that this amount of coal would build a Chinese wall along the outboundaries of the United States from Maine to Vancouver, to San Diego, and eastward to Maine again. England exported 77,000,000 tons. In fact, England's primacy in commerce is due to her coal exports, which afforded cargo to her merchant fleet and gave her bunkering facilities all over the globe.

She can no longer maintain this figure of exportation for many reasons, and is even now asking us for coal. Continental Europe freezes to-day, and will probably henceforth be forced to large purchases from us. Indeed, her prayers to us to-day are as fervent for fuel as they are for food and credit. We must also henceforth largely supply the South American market. It is easily imaginable that clearing this waterway to navigation will release for export millions of tons of coal from the central fields and thus stabilize labor and general mining conditions, giving to the mineworker what to-day he craves most—more days of work per year—with necessarily resulting benefit to the mine owner and operator as well.

The railroads, indeed, should be relieved as much as possible of the carriage of coal. It is the largest single item of railroad freight. Hydroelectric power and power generated by coal at the mouth of the mine will in no distant day not only avoid the great haulage of this low-grade freight, but will propel the trains themselves which will carry the high-value product of looms and factories that also are driven by electric power. We may indulge the high conception that one day this great coal-producing Nation will operate her mills, her mines, her railroads, by electric power and ship a vast mass of her coal production by water route almost from mine to foreign market.

The value and importance of water transportaion will be discussed by others, but I venture this question: Where would our iron industry be to-day were it not for the cheap water transportaion enjoyed by four-fifths of our total iron ore production tributary to the Great Lakes? That waterway and not that iron is the foundation of our position as the world's greatest producer of iron and steel. This is a fair illustration of the claims made by the proponents of this improvement, that transportation governs production. Indeed, obstructions to navigation are obstructions to commerce and obstructions to production. The removal of the first enhances the others. High cost of freight rates promotes high cost of living and puts production on the "red," and when production goes upon the red it is evidence that it has bled to death.

In his introduction to that most valuable work, recently issued, entitled "The Strategy of Minerals," Secretary Lane observes: "There is an international right to those things which are essential to life. * * * We are to grow nationally by our generosity internationally." Dr. Smith, director of the Geological Survey, and editor of this publication, also wisely asserts: "A nation's resources are of largest value if they serve the world." These are truths becoming more and more evident to the American mind as each of these present stressful days passes on. As never before in the history of the world must we realize that the prosperity and happiness of other countries means the happiness and prosperity of America.

A real and a sound objection to the construction of this waterway and the incidental production of this power may be found, and no doubt some of merit may be advanced. I do not know what they may be, but no doubt objections of a military or political nature may be advanced. They, I should say, are most insubstantial, are entitled only to passing consideration, and really may be answered in a sentence.

NEW YORK THE CHIEF BENEFICIARY.

Recurring again to the power possibilities of the St. Lawrence, I venture to say that it is readily perceptible to anyone that of all the States bordering or tributary to this waterway the greatest beneficiary of the development will be the great and Empire State of New York. The letting loose of this flood of power over her territory will cause her to leap to the front as a manufacturing State, and her products so stimulated by cheap power will find market in all the countries of the world. With her magnificent harbor and the superb advantage of her barge canal affording cheap water transportation thereto, and at the same time enjoying and possessing all the benefits of the St. Lawrence route, hundreds of miles nearer salt water than her Western competitors, her high-value manufactures will have a permanent primacy over any other State of the Union. Indeed, it is no idle dream to picture her barge canal and her lake shore dotted with factories of all kinds in enjoyment of this white coal at low rates in operation 365 days in the year, independent of season, their power coming into the factory on a wire instead of by rail and upon cars, free from labor, climatic, or transportation trouble or interruption. No other State of our Union has the same strategic advantage in power, population, labor supply, and transportation, and these advantages for natural and geographical reasons can probably never be lost; and this notwithstanding that the day is coming when the West will hold most of the black-coal reserves of the country in addition to her everlasting majority of the white-coal supply.

In conclusion, let me say that enlightened selfishness, the truest and highest interest of our country, our duty to all mankind, alike dictate that our back door as well as our front door be opened to ocean borne commerce. This is especially manifest because the by-product of electric energy will more than pay the cost of the job.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE].

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, ordinarily the membership of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House finds it possible to adjust all of their differences and bring in unanimous reports to this body under the leadership of its able chairman [Mr. BUTLER], and, if I may, I would like to pause here to pay him a tribute of the sincere affection and respect that each member of the committee, regardless of party, has for him personally. We have brought in a bill this time about which there is practical unanimity of opinion. I and possibly one or two others, however, find it impossible to be in accord with the majority on one item, but our difference of opinion is so firmly fixed, and in my judgment the matter is of such great importance that I have found it impossible to do what I generally do—compromise my differences in order that we may bring in a bill that has the entire committee behind it. The item to which I refer is the item making appropriation for naval aviation. I have two objections to the item, and at the proper time it is my purpose to present an amendment that I believe will cure what I consider to be a defect. In the first place, I do not believe that the appropriation is large enough. The general board recommended $27,000,000. The estimates as presented to the committee carried an appropriation of $25,000,000, and the committee in its wisdom has seen fit to cut that item to fifteen million and some hundreds of thousands of dollars. The bill as presented to the committee carried a general appropriation leaving in the department a very large discretion in the expenditure of the money——

Mr. YATES. Will the gentleman kindly state those figures again in reference to the reduction?

Mr. VENABLE. Twenty-five million dollars was carried in the bill as presented to the committee, and the committee cut it to $15,000,000. The general board recommended $27,000,000. As I stated, the bill as presented to the committee carried what might be called a general appropriation without it being itemized particularly. The committee saw fit under the direction of its most able chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. HICKS, of New York, to itemize the appropriations and to reduce the amount. As I have stated, I do not believe that the amount carried is large enough. Now, I appreciate, as I think every Member of the House does, the necessity of economy, but the reason I differ with the committee is because I believe in this instance economy does not consist in the reduction of the item, but that true economy consists in the granting of essential appropriations for the development of aviation. But a few short years ago the first flying machine was invented. Since the European war aviation has undergone a wonderful development and in a few short months, comparatively, became one of the chief arms of offensive and defensive warfare of the Great War in Europe; but even now the undisputed testimony of those who had anything to do with it is that it is still in its experimental stage. They all testify that aviation has possibilities that are but dimly comprehended at the present time.

They all testify, and it is the opinion of those with whom I have talked, that the future development of aviation and its application to naval warfare may affect and work a change in the entire system of naval construction. So we have a situation wherein a certain instrument is being applied to naval warfare and whose development may revolutionize the whole of naval building. That is a possibility. We are building ships now that cost thirty or thirty-five millions of dollars. We are building great capital ships, and year by year in their evolution they are becoming more and more expensive. We are pouring out hundreds of millions of dollars to build ships according to the standards of warfare as developed in the past, and we have here an agency in process of development that may make obsolete all vessels we are building and making appropriation for, and which would require putting them into the second or third lines. And we are not wise enough to go ahead and spend the money for necessary experimentation so that we can find out at the earliest possible moment what the possibilities of this arm of offense are. It may be within the next year or two that principles of application of aviation to naval warfare will be discovered that will make us determine not to appropriate any more money for the type of ships that we have been building. So it seems to me a part of wisdom, as a part of true economy, to be liberal in our appropriations for experimentation along this line, so that if we are making mistakes in appropriating hundreds of millions of dollars for building the present type of battleship and battle cruiser we will know it at the earliest possible moment and save the waste. Now, is there a possibility of that? We now have invented a torpedo for use under water, and we have developed it to such a stage of perfection that it will proceed under its own motive power regardless of wave currents to whatever its objective may be. That submarine torpedo is a very accurate instrument of warfare. A few short years ago if we should have said that some one would invent a submarine torpedo that could do what the torpedo does to-day men would have said we were foolish, and yet it does it, and in this present great war the English have invented an aerial torpedo to be launched from flying machines which no doubt will some day become as accurate an instrument, launched from the air, as if it had been launched beneath the seas from a submarine. In this war it was developed that airplanes and seaplanes could be carried upon carrier ships and loaded with deadly bombs and, taking to the air from the decks of those vessels, could attack the vessel of an enemy. No doubt the time will come when any fleet which takes the sea will carry with it in her carrier ships large numbers of flying craft.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VENABLE. I will, sir.

Mr. BLACK. Is it not a fact that experiments are under way now to get an aeroplane that will rise horizontally?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes, sir. So they would not even have to go on the ship. Experiments are meeting with some success. Yes; and with the reversible propeller, which enables the aeroplane to stop in a short space, without having to have a long landing field. In fact, the whole aeroplane situation bristles with possibilities, and no man will say or can say just what the effect of the development will be.

No man will or can say to what extent it will modify our whole naval building program and schedule. No man can or will say to what extent it will modify the application of the rules of strategy. I merely mentioned the inventions which I did and their application to present warfare to show how in a few short years the aeroplane, from being simply a pure experiment, has become a practical instrument with vast possibilities of development.

Now, then, up to this time it is true that vessels have not suffered much from bombs dropped from the air, according to the testimony of the experience of this European war. But if it is possible, by proper appliances, to direct a torpedo through the medium of water, the time will come in the application of sound mechanical principles to the aerial torpedo when it will be possible with the same accuracy to launch an aerial torpedo through the air with every assurance that it will reach its objective. We know the possibility of this is certain, and now we are confronted with the proposition that with the aeroplane and naval aviation in the purely experimental stage, you may say, with the possibility or high degree of probability of changing our whole program we are not to be liberal enough in our expenditures to develop its possibilities at the earliest possible date and save money, which we spend by the hundreds of millions to construct ships that will possibly be rendered obsolete or ineffective, on the idea that economy in this instance consists in reduction of appropriations. My contention is, in view of the facts and circumstances and possibilities of the situation, that true economy consists in being most liberal in appropriations for experimentation along the line of aviation, because what we will learn with the expenditure of a few millions of dollars may save us hundreds of millions in the future.

My first objection, as I have said, is that in my judgment this item has been reduced too much. At the proper time I am going to offer an amendment to restore to the item the amount which I think ought to be carried.

Now, another defect of the item is this, that it undertakes to itemize the things for which this money should be spent. Now, I know that the Congress is not in favor of general appropriations. I myself am not in favor of them as a general rule. I know the Congress wants to know what is to be done with its money, and it has a right to know. I favor the general rule of itemized appropriations, but there are always exceptions to every rule. You can not apply the usual rule to an unusual situation. Now, as I have said, the whole business of naval aviation as applied to naval warfare is in an experimental state. Plans are constantly changing. Experience may be gleaned, and this month's work will show that the line of endeavor should be along lines different from those already determined upon and work a complete change in the plans. And yet this Congress is asked, in a purely experimental thing about which as laymen we know nothing, to run the expenditure into molds, so that if the experts who are working at these problems change their minds they can not change the plan. The situation will be the same as if I were to hire a chemist and give him $5,000 to carry on a certain line of experimentation, and then say to him, "You can only spend a thousand dollars for test tubes; you can only spend $500 for acids; you can only spend so many hundred dollars for alkalies; can only expend so much money for this material, and that, and the other." The chemist would very promptly tell me, "I can give you my best judgment about what I think I am going to need, but, confessedly, this is an experiment; this is a voyage of exploration. I do not know what is over the horizon, and after I get in I may find from day to day that I must change my plans in order to carry on my experimental work most efficiently." Now, in this experimental work we propose—we who know nothing about it, who could not know anything about it, when it is confessedly largely experimental—we propose to say to these men, "We are going to limit your scientific and experimental judgment by placing a limitation on what you shall expend the money for."

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENABLE. With pleasure, sir.

Mr. TILSON. In regard to this item "to authorize the construction of one rigid airship, $1,500,000," is there one of these airships already in process of construction?

Mr. VENABLE. I do not think so; not of that type.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; that is a continuing appropriation.

Mr. TILSON. What is it? Is it something of the Zeppelin type?

Mr. VENABLE. I had in mind the super-Zeppelin they propose building to go across the Pacific.

Mr. TILSON. As to this new construction of stations, are we going to build a lot of new aviation stations at a cost of a million and a quarter of dollars?

Mr. VENABLE. That applies to hangars.

Mr. TILSON. Then we have not enough of these left over in the salvage from the war?

Mr. VENABLE. Not of the large hangars. We have not any for the Zeppelins.

Mr. TILSON. This is for the Zeppelins?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes; the lighter-than-air machines, which are tremendously big things.

Mr. TILSON. You must have large stations for them?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes. You have to build a special hangar large enough to contain them. They can not be left out in the weather. We had enough, of course, for the ordinary sea planes and things of that sort. Now, this appropriation covers construction, not for the building of stations, but for those essential buildings necessary for the operation of the planes. In other words, you might consider it as a part of the equipment for naval aviation work.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, this is my conception of the situation with reference to this item: I do not think that the ordinary rule with reference to items of appropriation should apply to a thing that is confessedly experimental. It may be that some of the money might be wasted. That is possible always. But you must always place some confidence in the men who are carrying on the work, particularly if it is a work of a technical character. If you employ a chemist to carry on chemical experiments, a metallurgist to carry on experiments in alloys, you must necessarily rely on his judgment, because that is the best possible opinion you can get and you have not any of your own. And there is less chance of waste in turning this money over to these officers, who are making a special study of naval aviation, than there is in this Congress undertaking to say that "We are going to dictate your experiments by dictating the thing for which you can spend the money, without allowing you any latitude."

Mr. YATES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. YATES. In view of your observation and experience in looking up this subject, what do you think the total appropriation ought to be for this purpose?

Mr. VENABLE. I think we ought to give them what they ask for, namely, $25,000,000.

Now, there is another question that possibly I can touch upon somewhat akin to but not contained in this item, and that is the question of whether or not the work of aviation as applied in the Army and the Navy or in the Post Office should be put under one head. My thought and observation and information on the subject leads me to be opposed to this.

If naval aviation, as it will be, becomes an effective instrumentality of war, it necessarily becomes but another arm of the naval service, and just as the battleship, the submarine, the torpedo boat, the supply ship must all act in cooperation in order to constitute one effective war machine, just so naval aviation, if it is to be effective, must be coordinated with the activities of the rest of the fleet. It becomes as much a part of the Navy as an instrumentality of war as does the battleship or the torpedo boat or the destroyer, and under actual battle conditions if naval aviation is to be of any value, aviation as applied to war must be in active cooperation in battle with the other naval instrumentalities. Naval strategy in its plans must make allowances for the use of aviation. Ships must be maneuvered, plans must be made, in order that the battle craft on the sea shall cooperate with the battle craft in the air, all together constituting one single battle machine.

Now, if that be true, if you are going to have the perfect coordination which makes for the highest efficiency, where you are using all types of craft it becomes absolutely essential as a matter of common sense that the man in the air must understand the man on the boat, and that the man on the boat must know something about the man in the air and his problems. In other words, the knowledge of naval aviation must be not alone with the pilot in the air but the officer on the ship must also have the knowledge of the kind necessary. He must know the possibilities of the air craft, as the air man knows the possibilities of the sea craft. They must be worked together, the plans for battle must provide for the coordination of these two arms of the service.

It does not take a military man to reach this conclusion. It is a matter of common sense. It is practically impossible, in my judgment, to have the highest state of battle efficiency between the vessels on the sea and the vessels in the air unless we have processes of training by which the officers who are to command the battleships, or some of them at least, shall have had experience in matters of aviation, and any system which would divorce their service from the line of command of ships, or work upon ships, would, in my judgment, be effective in frustrating the attainment of the degree of efficiency that would come by perfect coordination and understanding between the aviator and the vessel of the line.

Another reason why they should not be consolidated is that the problems of naval aviation are in their very nature fundamentally different from the problems of aviation over land or in the Army. As far as observations are concerned, they deal with a different medium. As far as strategy is concerned, they are necessarily as wide apart as the strategy of land fighting is apart from the strategy of fighting upon the sea. The problems are entirely different; and, as I have said, if you have your aviation confined to one corps, if in time of war you should happen to have no one on the vessel who had had aviation experience of the kind required, you would lack the coordination and cooperation which come from perfect understanding of the problems of the other man.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Conceding what the gentleman says in regard to the use of aircraft in warfare, what does the gentleman say about combining the different aircraft activities, so far as production and experimentation are concerned, both as to engines and planes and as to actual flying in the air? Would this be practical, leaving the operation of the airplanes entirely to the Army or entirely to the Navy, as the case may be, as the gentleman has so well stated?

Mr. VENABLE. So far as the manufacture and production of airplanes and airplane engines is concerned, I do not think the Government will ever go into the manufacturing business to a very large extent.

Mr. TILSON. How about the development?

Mr. VENABLE. They will simply give their orders for types which their engineers have worked out as being necessary from past experience.

Mr. TILSON. Should there not be cooperation in the working out of these types and the development of new types of both engines and planes?

Mr. VENABLE. I do not think that is possible.

Mr. TILSON. Instead of having a number of experiment stations, why not have one?

Mr. VENABLE. I do not think it is possible. Exchange of knowledge is possible and desirable, but work in common is impracticable for the reason, among others, that the problems of the Army and Navy service are so radically different as to make one organization not productive of the greatest good.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN].

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MANN of Illinois). The gentleman from California is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I may not take the entire 15 minutes. I want to read in my time a letter received from Mr. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, inclosing a letter written by Mr. George L. Berry, of Nashville, Tenn., president of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America, in relation to a letter read by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] on February 4, from a man by the name of Bernard Nolan, of New York City. This is Mr. Gompers's letter:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., March 8, 1920.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of a letter from Mr. George L. Berry, president of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union, a copy of which you will please find herein inclosed.

You will recall that Representative BLANTON, of Texas, read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 24, 1920, a letter which he stated he received from Mr. B. Nolan, from "Pressmen's Union No. 51," of New York City. The letter of President Berry came as a complete surprise to me, for I had not mentioned directly or indirectly to him or anyone else Mr. B. Nolan's letter.

Now, in view of the fact that if the contents of that letter find complete refutation by one who is officially and qualifiedly in a position to speak, it seems to me that the letter from President Berry should find a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in order that the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD may not have their minds perverted by maliciously untruthful assertions. If you can have President Berry's letter read into the RECORD, in the interest of justice, I shall greatly appreciate it.

Respectfully and cordially, yours,

SAMUEL GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

Hon. JOHN I. NOLAN,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. Berry's letter is dated Nashville, Tenn., March 5, and is written on the letterhead of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America, reading as follows:

INTERNATIONAL PRINTING PRESSMEN AND ASSISTANTS' UNION OF NORTH AMERICA, Nashville, Tenn., March 5, 1920.

Mr. SAMUEL GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: My attention has been called to the fact that Representative BLANTON, of Texas, in the course of his attack upon you and the American labor movement in a speech in the lower House of Congress on the 4th day of February, read into the RECORD a letter signed by Bernard Nolan, as president of the New York Pressmen's Union; and because of this letter I am addressing you to say that Bernard Nolan is not the president of the New York Pressmen's Union nor is he a member of the American Federation of Labor or the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union.

Bernard Nolan is one of several men who recently precipitated a strike in New York City to enforce conditions upon the industry that were absolutely impossible in accomplishment. He was the lieutenant of an avowed Bolshevist, James Bagley by name, one of the founders and organizers of the People's Peace Council, that was known to be against the Government in the prosecution of the war, and who upon several occasions declared for a revolution. By referring to the New York Times of March 1, 1919, you will find that Bagley made the following statement before the Central Federated Union: "We have waited too long about calling a general strike. It is time we went back to our organizations and told them to stop work now; or if later we are told to starve to death, we will starve; but starving, we will break into the grocery stores. The world is ripe for a revolution, and the sooner we get it the better."

Nolan, under the leadership of Bagley, assisted in tying up the commercial and magazine industry of New York on the 1st day of October, 1919, to enforce Bagley's ultimatum, Bagley declaring that they would not sign a contract with the employers; that the chairman of the chapel of each plant henceforth was to act not only as a mechanical director, to employ and discharge men regardless of their position in the industry, but that at the end of each month the mechanical superintendent would distribute the remaining surplus or profits over and above the cost of operation. Moreover, Bagley declared that if the employers did not grant the concessions demanded that they could get out of the business; that the organizations intended to take over the industry anyhow.

In addition to the foregoing, the strike precipitated by Nolan and Bagley in contradiction to the laws of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union brought about a forced unemployment of more than 20,000 persons and a cost to the men and the industry of many millions of dollars.

The International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union being an American institution and affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and working in harmony with the policies of that organization, does not permit in its ranks men who stand for bolshevism, revolution, or un-American principles. Nolan and Bagley therefore have not been and are not now affiliated with organized labor. The statement emanating from Nolan simply conveyed his personal opinion, and comes from a man not associated with organized labor or one engaged in any trade or industry, for his time and attention have for some time and are now being given to agitation looking to the breaking down of the policies of the American Federation of Labor that stands for collective bargaining arrived at by conciliation and fair arbitration.

To say that I was astonished at Congressman BLANTON using a letter from Nolan, whose reputation is such as stated above, is placing it rather lightly. By the use of such a document, Congressman BLANTON gives comfort and encouragement, whether intentionally or unintentionally, to the most destructive element in America against American industrial traditions and against the Government of the United States.

The International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America, with an organization of 87 per cent of the printers affiliated with it on this continent, that gave to the Government 5,212 of its members during the war, that did not have a strike during the entire period of the war, resents the action of Congressman BLANTON in using a letter intended to convey the idea that it represented the sentiment of the printing pressmen. Moreover, we feel that the attack upon you as president of the American Federation of Labor is an attack upon the American labor movement and indirectly an attack upon the constitutional authorities of the Government of the United States.

You are at liberty to use this letter in any manner.

Fraternally, yours,

GEORGE L. BERRY,
President International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California yields back eight minutes.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for one minute.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I desire to insert in the RECORD a short statement by the Steamboat-Inspection Service concerning the conditions of the service and certain requirements which they ask for.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the paper referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the paper referred to:

Memorandum relative to the Steamboat-Inspection Service and the need of salary increase for its members.

The Steamboat-Inspection Service is the one which, under the law:

Inspects and passes on the seaworthiness of steamers and other water craft.

That determines the crew necessary for steamers' safe navigation.

That examines and licenses the officers of steamers and other craft.

That has charge of the certification of lifeboat men and able seamen.

That has jurisdiction and watches the building of life preservers, lifeboats, rafts, and other life-saving equipment.

That inspects and passes on the fire-fighting conditions and the equipment on board ship.

That investigates all marine disasters and happenings, having for this purpose the authority to summon witnesses the same as in the United States court.

That conducts trials of licensed officers.

In fact, has entire charge of the steamers, their construction, their repairs, the testing of material at the mills, and many other things too numerous to mention.

This service has, through the years of its existence, drawn to it and practically trained at Government expense its corps of inspectors and clerks, or at least so many of them as remain in the service at the present time.

This service has been ably managed by those in autohrity so that to date travel by water is the safest method of travel known. This has been accomplished only by the untiring efforts of those in authority and its small force of trained inspectors.

During the war this service did good work and the members of the service are entitled to favorable mention because of the fact that they stuck to their positions when they were so much needed and when other outside employment offered to them a far greater opportunity for financial advancement.

The clerks of the service should receive attention at this time, as they have not had any salary increase for years, and are entitled to this consideration because of the increased cost of living and because of the fact that heretofore they have not been properly classified, being placed in the same classification as the ordinary civil-service clerk.

In reality these clerks are, in addition to the general work which they must do, called upon to take testimony in investigations and trials held by the inspectors and are in effect court stenographers and reporters and are capable of filling these positions creditably. They are called upon to do this work in connection with other regular clerical duties and receive no added or special remuneration because of this service.

Every effort should be made to advance to passage the bills H. R. 5003 and S. 1254. These measures have the support of the bureau and the honorable Secretary of Commerce, Joshua W. Alexander.

Steamers of the Merchant Marine are officered by men who have passed an examination before the inspectors, the examiner being required to pass upon the fitness of the man and the extent of the license granted.

The high standard of the morale of the officers of the Merchant Marine and their success in the management of the steamers of the Merchant Marine speaks forcibly of the wisdom and judgment of the inspectors who license them.

Bear in mind these inspectors were licensed officers before they became inspectors, as it is a requirement of the civil service that before becoming an inspector a person must hold a license of the highest grade and must have some years of service on that license.

These inspectors still retain their licenses and are in position to leave the service and go back on board ship as masters and chief engineers and receive in cash a salary more than double that they receive as inspectors, and considering the value of subsistence and board which they receive on board ship, receive a salary in reality about three times as valuable as that they receive as inspectors.

The merchant marine shipowners are now unable to secure a sufficient number of licensed officers, and a large number of steamers are coming out and will continue to come out for some years from the shipyards of the country. This information can be obtained from the Government's own records and from the program of the United States Shipping Board.

Due to the fact that there is a shortage of licensed officers, and this shortage becoming more intense as new ships come out, nearly every inspector of the service, no matter what his age, can go back on board ship in the capacity for which he is licensed, and owners and shipping board officials would be glad to get him.

This means that as more and more steamers come out from the shipyards and go into commission, officers for these steamers must either come from the ranks of the licensed officers who are at present steamboat inspectors or from the ranks of the present unlicensed men, after those unlicensed men have passed an examination before the inspectors of the Steamboat-Inspection Service to secure their license.

In order to protect property and life of the traveling public it is imperative that the examinations be thorough, so that none but competent men receive licenses.

It therefore is necessary that the man holding the position of inspector must be one who has experience and knowledge to pass upon the qualifications of these licensed officers properly.

Please note that with the present low salaries in the service it is impossible to replace men leaving the service by competent licensed officers. This is evidenced by the letters of Secretary of Commerce, Hon. Joshua W. Alexander. (See H. Doc. 589).

It is evidenced as fact that the type of licensed officer who could be induced to accept a position at the present low salary in the Steamboat-Inspection Service would not be of the type which would have the caliber to inspect vessels properly or license officers judiciously.

It is continually necessary, in view of the accidents which occur in the merchant marine, that the investigations by the Steamboat-Inspection Service be conducted by those inspectors who have, out of their experience, become conversant with the laws and rules and with the method of conducting all such semilegal hearings Only men of experience and training should be allowed to pass, sit, and judge such cases.

With the inducements outside of the service and men leaving the service for employment on board ship and in other lines of effort paying very much greater wages, and with the service paying so small a salary that it can not hope to draw to it efficient help with positions at the present time open, due to resignations, and no prospect of filling them, the service is in great danger of disruption and surely can not maintain its present efficiency.

In justice to the vessel owners, vessel builders, the crews of the ships, and the traveling public it is imperative that the standard of efficiency of this service should be maintained, and Congress can not afford to allow it to be disorganized for the want of sufficient appropriation to retain the trained workers in its service.

The salaries paid in the merchant marine by private owners generally equal that or better than that paid by the Government in its Emergency Fleet steamers. Salaries on the Great Lakes are approximately those at present paid on salt water.

The Emergency Fleet (Shipping Board) schedule for its masters for the smallest class of ships is $330 per month, or $3,960 per annum; and $412.50 per month for the masters of its first-class steamers, or $4,950 per annum.

Please bear in mind that these licensed officers on board ship receive, in addition to these salaries, their lodgings and board. Some of the private companies furnish their men with life insurance equivalent to a year's salary at no cost to the officers.

Others provide opportunities to buy stock in the company at a preferential rate considerably below the market, and at the same time pay the masters good big bonuses for a successful season.

We believe that the licensed officers are subordinate to the Steamboat-Inspection Service. We believe that the lowest officer of the Steamboat-Inspection Service should receive a salary equal to that of the highest licensed officer on board ship, or $412.50 per month, as per Shipping Board (Emergency Fleet) schedule.

We might go on and give you a lot more data in regard to the situation, show the scales of salaries paid, show the increase in the cost of living with no increase in salary, show the special nature of the work, or, in other words, show the need of an emergency appropriation measure to hold the men in the service at the present time, and the need of permanent salary legislation to do the men in the service justice throughout, both inspectors and clerks.

We will be glad to furnish you with any particular type of data which might appeal to you, so that you may have a comprehensive grasp of the situation. We feel that if you thoroughly understand the situation you will, growing out of the spirit of justice and fair play, be a hardened advocate of some relief for the service, even in the face of the general spirit of economy, which we understand is predominant in Congress at the present time.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, on last Monday some discussion was had here with reference to a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] on the print-paper situation. I had hoped at that time to secure recognition to address the House on this same question, because on the 3d of December, 1919, I introduced a resolution providing for an investigation of that condition in this country. The price of paper has been rising gradually since 1913, until to-day the smaller newspapers of the country are compelled to pay the enormous sum of from $10.50 to $11 per hundredweight for print paper. Having given this matter a great deal of consideration, I thought in December that it was necessary to have an investigation thereof by a special committee of the House appointed by Congress, and with that in view I introduced the resolution to which I have referred; but after that time, and after having talked with the chairman, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, of the Committee on Rules, to which this resolution was referred, I was convinced that it was unnecessary at this time to have that resolution passed by the House ordering an investigation on the part of the membership of the House by a special committee.

There has been a general complaint throughout the country, through the press, against the high prices that the small newspapers and the newspapers of the smaller cities, towns, and villages have been required to pay for print paper.

I have heard a number of excuses made here by Members on the floor of this House with reference to the high cost of print paper, and one of the excuses I heard that seemed to be of some force and effect was this: That there was a lack of wood pulp and other materials which are necessary elements going to make up the manufacture of newsprint paper. I investigated that matter thoroughly, and I found that there was no reason on earth for offering such an excuse as that. Before I have finished my address I will be able to show you why that excuse is not justified.

I heard another Member say as an excuse for the high cost of print paper that it was due to the fact that the metropolitan papers throughout the country had purchased all the production of the various paper mills in this country under contract, and that consequently the editors and owners of the smaller newspapers of the country were compelled to go into the open market to purchase the paper which they needed, and that they met in that market as competitors the owners of the large metropolitan papers, for the reason that the increase in advertising had been so great as to force the metropolitan papers to use a greater quantity of paper than they had anticipated or that they could secure under their contracts, so that they were compelled to go into the open market and that consequently the price went up.

Another excuse given for the high cost of print paper was that there was a scarcity of labor, and that the paper mills of the country were unable to run to full capacity and full production. I regret to say that these excuses do not prevail at this time.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. I am glad to yield to my colleague.

Mr. EMERSON. My colleague has spent a great deal of time in studying this question. What does he suggest that Congress should do to relieve the paper situation?

Mr. RICKETTS. I have never been in favor of licensing the corporations of this country heretofore. I have rather thought that the Government ought not to go that far in controlling these large corporations, which have a tendency to combine their interests and thereby stamp out competition and fix the price of the commodities they manufacture. But the time has come when we must in some way determine who these stockholders are and with what corporations they are connected, and how much stock they have, what their prices are, and how they manage or conduct their business; either that or we must have a strict enforcement of the law that will punish those who violate the principles laid down in the Sherman antitrust law as supplemented and amended by the Clayton Act.

Mr. McKEOWN. I am interested in what the gentleman is saying, but I am much more interested because of his statement that he could show that the excuse of lack of pulp is not the cause of the shortage or the high prices. I would like to hear what the gentleman has to say about that.

Mr. RICKETTS. I want to refer to that before I get through, if I have the time.

On December 3, 1919, I introduced a resolution in the House, which was referred to the Committee on Rules, which resolution proposed an investigation of the paper industry of this country by a committee of Congress, with a view to determining the following facts:

First. The quantity of print paper on hand in the paper mills, factories, storage, and in transit.

Second. Whether such print paper is being controlled by monopoly, Paper Trust, or conspiracy.

Third. The relationship, if any, between the metropolitan publishers and the pulp and paper industry.

Fourth. What portion, if any, of the stock of the pulp and paper industry of the United States is controlled by foreign capital, and the number of foreign stockholders and amount of stock held by each.

Fifth. The reason for the apparent discrimination in the sale and price of print paper to the metropolitan publishers and to publishers of daily and weekly papers in county seats and local communities.

Sixth. Such other facts and information as will enable Congress to determine the exact status of the pulp and paper industry in the United States.

I was impelled from a sense of duty to introduce this resolution because of complaints that had come to me from constituents of the district which I have the honor to represent, who are engaged in the newspaper business, and from other sections of the country. Prior to the introduction of this resolution I had made some investigation, and I assure you that I have made no little investigation since having introduced it. I believed then, as I believe now, that there is no just or honest reason why the owners of small newspapers in the United States should be forced to pay such an enormous price for newsprint paper.

The production of all grades of newsprint paper for the year 1919 was greater than during the preceding year, being slightly more than 9 per cent over 1918. The stocks of newsprint paper on hand at the paper mills decreased materially from the beginning of 1917 to the end of 1919. The stocks of total newsprint paper reported in the mills on January 1, 1917, amounted to 38,998 tons, whereas the stock of total newsprint paper on hand on December 31, 1919, amounted to only 15,369 tons. The stocks of standard newsprint paper held by the mills on January 1, 1917, amounted to 26,447 tons, and amounted to only 12,338 tons on December 31, 1919. Stocks of book paper held by the paper mills were slightly greater on December 31, 1919, than on January 1, 1917. The increase in book paper, however, for the year 1919 amounted to almost 8 per cent over 1918, and stocks of paper board also increased during this period. The production increased in both 1918 and 1919 over 1917. The increase for 1919 over 1917 amounted to 8 per cent. Stocks of wrapping paper increased during the two-year period. The production of bag paper for 1919 amounted to 50 per cent more than in 1917.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman have figures later on that show the increase in the consumption and use of print paper for 1919?

Mr. RICKETTS. I will not be able to show that.

Mr. BLACK. The reason I asked the question is that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], in making a few remarks on the resolution a few days ago, said that he had had figures from the Trade Commission to the effect that the increased consumption of newspaper print in 1919 was 36 per cent, and if that is true, it would at least in a way account for some of the advance in the price.

Mr. RICKETTS. I agree with the gentleman, but I do not think the report shows that fact. I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] is mistaken.

Mr. BLACK. I am not affirming that to be the fact, but I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that it was stated on the floor of the House to be the fact.

Mr. RICKETTS. I have all of these reports in my office and I have read them through from end to end and have investigated the matter to determine that fact. I have been unable to determine that to be the fact, in favor of the International Paper Co. or of the News Print Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. In that connection, is it not a fact that the War Industries Board rationed the larger papers during the year 1918, and that there was not so much paper simply by reason of the limitation on the size of the newspaper?

Mr. RICKETTS. I can not agree with that theory. I do not think that is true. I think there was more paper used during the war than has been used since.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. Yes; I am glad to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. YATES. As the gentleman has had, I have had quite a number of complaints from small newspapers, who are complaining that they can not get what they want. Some of them seem to think that there is a real scarcity, and I would like to know whether from the gentleman's investigation he thinks there is a real scarcity, or whether the prices have been kept up by a combination?

Mr. RICKETTS. I do not think there is a scarcity of print paper at all. I am convinced that the paper is in the hands of a monopoly. I would not make that statement recklessly, because I have seriously considered this proposition from every angle, and I have tried to treat it fairly from every point of view. I am convinced that the trouble with this proposition is that the International Paper Co. and the News Print Manufacturers' Association and their subsidiaries are in a combination to control the supply of paper, and by this means are able to control the price of paper. They have ignored entirely and cast aside the old idea of the law of supply and demand controlling the prices in this country.

Mr. YATES. Is there something that Congress can do? And if so, want to do it.

Mr. RICKETTS. I want to get to that point in a moment.

Mr. Chairman, the cost of print paper for the past five years has been a subject of the greatest concern to the stockholders, owners, and editors of local and country newspapers. Many editorials have been written on this important subject, in which a general complaint has been made and in which it has been openly charged that the News Print Manufacturers' Association and the International Paper Co., and other paper companies subsidiary thereto, are controlling both the quantity of paper manufactured and the sale price of the same in the market, in open violation of the Sherman antitrust law, as amended and supplemented by the Clayton Act.

In addition to this general complaint through the press of the high cost of print paper, the Federal Trade Commission made a thorough investigation of the cost of newsprint paper in the year 1916 and in the first part of the year 1917.

As a result of this investigation, two cases were made out by the Government, through the Department of Justice, against more than 50 paper manufacturers, both of the United States and Canada, and on April 12, 1917, an indictment was lodged against these various companies charging them with flagrant violation of many of the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law. This case was disposed of in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York on pleas of nolo contendere, and the court imposed fines upon the defendants aggregating $11,000. It is needless to say that these fines were immediately paid by the defendant manufacturers. They were glad to pay them; and, while these fines are in a measure only nominal, yet they are significant, because the payment thereof is an admission of guilt on the part of the defendants. Guilty of what? Guilty of violating the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law. When? During the war period.

It is startling, indeed, to note that the paper manufacturers of this country and of Canada were in a great combine during the time that the United States and Canada were engaged in the great World War. Startling, is it not, to think of the fact that men who posed as American citizens and men who posed as Canadian citizens were making illegal and unjustifiable profits out of the newsprint paper business at the cost of the blood of our soldiers who were fighting our battles in order to preserve our rights. War had been declared by the United States on April 6, and six days thereafter these various defendants were indicted. Indicted for what? For willfully violating a Federal statute for the sole purpose of fleecing the small newspapers in the country out of their money, in open violation of law. No doubt prior to that time they had made millions of dollars in the way of profits taken illegally from the owners and editors of small newspapers throughout the country, located in the smaller cities, towns, and villages.

At the same time the Government, through the Department of Justice, filed a suit in equity against these various defendants, praying for an injunction against further violation of the Sherman antitrust law. The civil case was disposed of by a consent entry in the form of a court decree granting the relief prayed for in the Government's petition. At the same time an agreement was entered into between the Attorney General and a number of manufacturers of newsprint paper which provided that said manufacturers would dispose of their product under certain terms and conditions during the period of the war and for three months thereafter.

Why did these various defendants consent to a court decree enjoining them from further violation of the Sherman antitrust law? It is because they were guilty, and by agreeing to the entry they admitted their guilt.

Of course, the indictment against these defendants and the institution of a civil suit for relief in equity by injunction had for a time the effect of reducing the price of newsprint paper. However, the reduction in price was short-lived. This Paper Trust combination could not forbear taking from its customers unlawful, unreasonable, and unjustifiable profits, and to-day the small newspapers of this country are forced to purchase newsprint paper at any price the Paper Trust may see fit to demand. This great combination of capital is still in the profiteering business. It is still pursuing its method of fleecing the owners and editors of the small newspapers throughout the country out of their money. They are determined to destroy them, law or no law. The most recent price quoted is 11 cents per pound or $11 per hundredweight. Many newspapers throughout the country, on account of the high price of newsprint paper, have been forced out of business. Many of them have been compelled to combine with other papers, in order to be able to meet the price demanded for newsprint paper.

Stocks of bag paper decreased during the period. Stocks of fine paper increased during the period. Production of fine paper also increased materially throughout the period, the increase for the year 1919 over 1917 being 20 per cent. The production of tissue paper also increased materially throughout the period, the per cent of increase for 1919 over 1917 being 23 per cent. Stocks of tissue paper also increased during the period.

The production of hanging paper, the basic stock for which is practically the same as for newsprint paper, was greater in 1919 than in either 1917 or 1918. The per cent of increase in the production of hanging paper in 1919 over 1918 amounted to more than 45 per cent.

The total production of all grades of paper was greater in 1919 than either in 1917 or 1918, amounting to 6,190,361 tons more. The production in 1919 was almost 5 per cent greater than in 1917 and slightly more than 2 per cent greater than in 1918. So it is perfectly plain that there was no lack of material for the manufacture of newsprint paper in 1919. When we look for the cause of the mammoth increase in price of newsprint paper we will be compelled to look beyond the subject of material.

The increase in the tonnage used by these publishers for the year 1919 over 1918, based upon the prorated average of 600 concerns, amounted to about 14 per cent. The greatest increase, however, in consumption occurred during the last quarter of 1919. This increase, based upon the prorated average consumption for 600 concerns, amounted to more than 24 per cent. The consumption of newsprint by publishers decreased slightly during December, 1919, as compared with October and November, but whether or not this decrease will indicate the future trend can not be forecast.

Weighted average prices of newsprint paper per hundred pounds f. o. b. mill, by months, from January, 1913, to December, 1919, is as follows:

	1913	1914	1915	1916	1917	1918	1919
January	$1.92	$1.92	$1.91	$1.94	$2.87	$3.029	$3.682
February	1.94	1.97	1.95	1.97	2.87	3.029	3.583
March	1.96	1.94	1.96	1.97	2.85	3.033	3.606
April	1.94	1.95	1.91	1.96	3.11	3.427	3.636
May	1.97	1.94	1.88	1.97	3.15	3.566	3.690
June	1.97	1.97	1.95	1.94	3.13	3.604	3.656
July	2.01	1.95	1.91	2.03	3.17	3.723	3.632
August	1.97	1.96	1.91	2.09	3.17	3.730	3.682
September	1.96	2.00	1.97	2.12	3.20	3.737	3.779
October	1.99	1.95	1.90	2.18	3.18	3.734	3.844
November	1.95	1.95	1.93	2.20	3.16	3.756	3.902
December	1.94	1.96	1.93	2.30	3.17	3.736	4.110

The lowest average price per hundred pounds f. o. b. mills occurred in May, 1915, being only $1.88 per hundred. The highest price was for December, 1919, being $4.11 per hundred f. o. b. mill, representing an increased cost to consumers slightly more than 118 per cent.

These average prices are based upon delivery on many long-term contracts made at prewar prices. Practically all long-term contracts were either satisfied or canceled before the end of year 1919. The minimum contract prices announced by a number of large manufacturers of newsprint paper for the first quarter of 1920 only are $4.50 and $4.90 per hundred pounds f. o. b. mill. The market quotations for March have ranged from $10.50 to $11 per hundred pounds f. o. b. mill. What the selling price will be after the end of the first quarter of 1920 is purely problematical.

That the sale price of newsprint paper is under the absolute and complete control of the Newsprint Manufacturers' Association or newsprint paper combine is absolutely certain.

The consent decree filed in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York on November 26, 1917, contains, among other things, the following:

Defendants, by becoming and acting as members of the Newsprint Manufacturers' Association, have entered into and engaged in an unlawful combination in restraint of trade and commerce in newsprint paper among the several States and with foreign nations, in violation of the act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies."

This decree further dissolves the Newsprint Paper Manufacturers' Association, and each corporate defendant is perpetually enjoined from entering into any combination, agreement, understanding, or concert of action with any other corporate defendant, or with any other manufacturer of newsprint paper, having for purpose or effect to limit or restrict itself as to the customers to whom it shall sell or offer to sell newsprint paper. Not only were the corporate defendants enjoined, but the decree further recites that it shall apply to and be binding upon such corporations or their respective officers, directors, agents, and employees and all other persons, firms, or corporations acting under, for, or in behalf of them, or any of them, or claiming so to act.

Judging from the activities of the Newsprint Manufacturers' Association prior to November, 1917, with reference to its ability and power to control the price of newsprint paper, we naturally conclude that inasmuch as newsprint paper has continued to increase in price some uniform and effective method has been adopted by the paper mills of the country, under some sort of agreement, and we predicate this conclusion upon the fact that the same business methods have been in vogue on the part of the paper mills of the country ever since the decree was entered that they pursued prior thereto. It is evident to every clear-thinking man, or at least should be, that there is something radically wrong.

And why is discrimination made in the price quoted to the small newspapers of the country as compared with that quoted to the metropolitan papers? The news jobbers, brokers, and salesmen undertake to excuse the high price in the market for newsprint paper by asserting that the entire product of the paper mills of the country is being consumed by customers who have contracts with these various paper mills.

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. I will.

Mr. HOCH. If it will not interrupt the gentleman I would like to ask him a question or two in reference to the consent decree to which the gentleman referred a moment ago. As I understand it that decree not only fixed the maximum price but also provided that these defendants were to allocate a certain portion of the supply to small papers and also provided the margin of profit the jobber was to get. Has the gentleman any information as to whether that proportion of the supply was, as a matter of fact, allocated to the use of the small papers, and has he any information with reference to whether the jobbers have been living up to the decree?

Mr. RICKETTS. I do not think they have recognized the decree at all. I do not know anything about the allotment that was granted to the small papers of the country.

Mr. HOCH. Were the jobbers defendants in that action?

Mr. RICKETTS. This injunction enjoined manufacturers, their agents, jobbers, salesmen, and everybody connected with the concern. This thing of saying you will go in the market and buy paper—into what market? Into the market of this monopoly, because they control the jobber, they control the salesmen, they control everybody connected with the business. That is the way it works out.

Mr. HOCH. I am entirely in sympathy with what the gentleman is saying, but my judgment is the jobber is one of the principal offenders as far as the small users of paper are concerned. I was interested to know on what theory the jobber was made a defendant to the action, and if he was the rightful defendant why he has not been compelled to live up to the terms of that decree.

Mr. RICKETTS. Well, I can not answer that question. I can not say why the Attorney General has not enforced that decree and the law, and I have nothing to say in regard to that, but I am not in favor when a great corporation undertakes to monopolize the trade in any line and then finds itself in the clutches of any law and undertakes to excuse itself by agreeing not to do certain things afterwards. I think the law should be enforced and when a man breaks the law he should suffer the penalty. These big corporations should not be allowed to handle matters in this way. A big corporation should be required to obey the law the same as an individual.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RICKETTS. I regret I can not. I am sorry, but I have not the time to do so.

Gentlemen of the House, there seems to be a general move on the part of the newsprint manufacturers of the United States and Canada to clean out the small papers in the United States, or, rather, to freeze them out, by making the price so high that the owners of small newspapers can not afford to purchase newsprint paper.

The paper mills of the country do not make the complaint that they are unable to procure material from which to manufacture newsprint paper, nor do they complain of a lack of labor. They do not undertake to say that they are unable to run their mills at full capacity because they can not procure the material or the labor to do so, but they meet the demand for paper with the statement that they have contracts for all the paper that they have on hand, and consequently can not supply the small papers of the country with what they need in order to continue their business. What becomes of the newsprint paper that is manufactured by these various mills throughout the country? Is it possible that they have devised another scheme by which they can evade the law and can continue for an indefinite period of time to extract from the owners of the smaller newspapers outrageous and almost treasonable profits? The demand for paper is not nearly so great as it was during the war period. There has been no decrease in the manufacture of newsprint paper during the last year. Now, why have not they a sufficient supply on hand? If they have the necessary number of mills and the material out of which to manufacture paper, if they are supplied with labor sufficient to run their mills, why should not they have a sufficient tonnage on hand to supply the demands in the market?

The law of supply and demand no longer prevails with reference to newsprint paper manufacturers. They have ignored it entirely. They have another and better scheme of their own, by which they can force the owners of small newspapers throughout the country to pay just such prices as they see fit to demand for newsprint paper. By a careful study of the statistics furnished me by the Federal Trade Commission, which commission has made a very careful study of the paper situation in the United States, I find that the paper mills of this country manufacture a great many varieties of paper—news print, standard news, book paper, paper board, wrapping paper, bag paper, fine paper, tissue paper, hanging paper, and felt and building paper.

They also manufacture a great variety of specialties that they do not classify under any of the above heads.

The Federal Trade Commission has been able to secure numerous reports from the various paper mills throughout the country as to the quantity, quality, price, and different classes of paper manufactured.

How does this great paper combine control the price of newsprint paper in this country? Is it possible that they control the market in the United States by shifting from the manufacture of newsprint paper to the manufacture of some other grade, and when they have manufactured such quantity of newsprint paper as, in their judgment, is sufficient to control the market and the supply of newsprint paper do they then shift to the manufacture of some other class of paper, and in this way control the output of the paper mills of the country and thereby control the supply to the market and the market prices? It seems to me that it is clear that this great Paper Trust regulates the price by regulating the supply, and in this manner is able to filch from the owners of small newspapers throughout the country enormous, unreasonable, and unjustifiable profits. This method of regulating the supply and the price of newsprint paper continued all through the period of the war, and it has been continuing ever since the armistice was signed.

Gentlemen of the House, has it come to pass that the people of this Nation are to be controlled in the purchase of domestic commodities and all other commodities essential to the successful prosecution of private business? Is it possible that a monopoly in the things that the people must have is to control the prices? A monopoly in the things that the people must have is intolerable and indefensible. The people of this country will stand only for reasonable profits. They do not want to destroy reasonable profits. They will stand for gouging just so long and no longer. [Applause.]

The Newsprint Manufacturers' Association is a voluntary association that was formed about April 1, 1915, and is composed of a large number of corporations under the management of a number of individuals. Its offices are located at 18 East Forty-first Street, in the Borough of Manhattan, southern district of New York. This association has no constitution, no by-laws, no minutes of proceedings. The different corporations composing this organization and other like organizations operate under what is known as a "gentlemen's agreement," and the different directors, agents, officers, managers, brokers, and salesmen of these various corporations now conducting the paper business in the United States and Canada are able to control their business by comparing notes under the guise of holding executive sessions to discuss the markets. They do not meet to discuss the markets. The demand for paper could not be greater. They have no need to discuss the market. In my judgment they meet for the sole purpose of devising ways and means by which they can wrest from the owners of the small newspapers of the country greater profits by controlling the markets.

JUSTIFICATION OF UNDUE PRICES.

The inspectors of the Federal Trade Commission examined the books and correspondence of a number of newsprint and bookprint mills throughout the country in the year 1916.

The correspondence proves that the manufacturers knew that their prices and profits were exorbitant, but the members of the Newsprint Manufacturers' Association seek to justify such exactions because prices, they claim, in the past have been low, and in the future may again be so. As a matter of fact, most of the companies made good profits under substantial normal conditions in 1915.

Among other things found in the correspondence which shed light upon the subject were the following excerpts from letters written:

On February 25, 1916, a member wrote to another that his company felt they must make a profit to partly "compensate for some of the losses when the prices began to decline," and "would appreciate a line from you stating what you are doing in the way of prices."

In a letter of March 7, 1916, the same member, writing to the same concern, stated that opportunity should not be lost for making money that had not been made in the past. He suggested that manufacturer's customers be made to pay the market prices, and that they in turn "get it back from their customers."

At a general meeting on June 14, 1916, of the members of the bureau of statistics of bookprint manufacturers, held at the office of the secretary of the bureau of statistics in the Vanderbilt Hotel, New York City, the representative of a prominent member concern said, referring to his own company, that the public had ground them down for years and that now they were going to make the public pay.

Indicative of common knowledge of, and responsibility for, proposed advances, is a letter written on June 9, 1916, by a prominent member to a wholesaler, a little more than a week before one of the general price advances in book paper:

I want you to get under cover if you want any of our papers at this price.

And on the margin of the letter he wrote:

Fireworks about to start. Get busy either with me or elsewhere. Suit yourselves, but consider service.

This brought orders from the wholesaler, and on June 19, 1916, the date on which the manufacturer advanced his prices, the latter wrote the same wholesaler:

It is indeed a pleasure to see you get under cover. Many have insisted that prices are going to drop and have held off accordingly, and will have to take their medicine. Prices will go higher.

These are just a few of many examples of documentary evidence which I have been able to procure in relation to this most important subject, and it will be noticed that these letters were written back in 1916, so, it is perfectly plain that prices have gone higher. The reason for it, it seems to me, can not be misunderstood.

PROFITS OF INTERNATIONAL PAPER CO.

Balance for dividends after all overhead charges and expenses were paid bonded interests, and so forth, was—

In the year 1912	$1,197,578
In the year 1913	993,805
In the year 1914	1,137,709
In the year 1915	1,219,515
In the year 1916	5,120,728
In the year 1917	8,180,787

All these figures are taken from Poor's Manuals of Industrials for 1918, at page 2593.

In the year 1918	$5,152,570

according to Moody's Analyses of Public Utilities and Industrial Investments, for 1918, at page 992.

These earnings on the common stock in recent years, according to Moody's Analyses, same page, were in 1917, $34.02 per share on common stock, and in 1918 were $18.48 per share on common stock. The estimated earnings for 1919 are from $25 to $35 per share on the common stock.

Taking the lower estimate of $25 per share, the company will have earned a total of $102.34 per share on common stock in the last four years; they will have earned more than the par of the stock. (Wall Street Journal, Oct. 30, 1919, p. 1.)

NEWSPRINT PAPER REVIEW FOR THE MONTH OF JANUARY, 1920.

The following is a review of the reports received from domestic manufacturers of newsprint paper, from jobbers buying and selling newsprint paper, and from leading publishers using newsprint paper. Import and export figures of the Department of Commerce are also included in the review. Whenever possible the figures for 1920 are compared with those for the corresponding period of 1919.

The figures which follow show the results of the commission's tabulation of the reports for January, 1920, compared with January, 1919.

	Number of mills.	Stock on hand first of month.	Production.	Shipments.	Stock on hand end of month.
Total print:		Net tons.	Net tons.	Net tons.	Net tons.
January, 1920	89	15,369	129,663	128,098	16,934
January, 1919	66	19,408	116,154	114,343	21,219
Standard news:
January, 1920	66	12,338	114,957	112,719	14,576
January, 1919	51	15,656	106,002	105,169	16,489

NOTE.—Above figures for total print do not include hanging paper, but include the print paper production of mills operating for the most part on some other grade. All figures prior to March, 1919, have been prorated from a weekly basis to a calendar month basis.

The average or normal production of total print and standard news, based upon total production for the years 1917 and 1918, amounted to 109,798 tons of total print and 99,034 tons of standard news for a period corresponding to January. The average production, based upon the weekly and monthly reports for the 18-month period ended September 30, 1919, amounted to 111,618 tons of total print and 100,646 tons of standard news, whereas the actual production amounted to 129,663 tons of total print and 114,957 tons of standard news.

The increase in the production of newsprint in January, 1920, over January, 1919, amounted to more than 11 per cent for total print and slightly more than 8 per cent for standard news. The production of both grades for January, 1920, also showed an increase over that of December, 1919.

Mill stocks of both standard news and total print increased during January, 1920.

In addition to the stocks given above 1,061 tons were reported on hand at terminal and delivery points January 31, 1920.

JOBBERS' TONNAGE.

The following tabulation shows the newsprint tonnage reported by sales agents and jobbers during the month of January, 1920, compared with January, 1919, together with commitments to buy and sell:

	On hand first of month.	Received during month.	Shipped during month.	On hand end of month.	Commitments to buy.	Commitments to sell.
Rolls:
January, 1920	1,920	6,721	6,742	1,899	65,526	74,097
January, 1919	3,262	2,895	2,727	3,430	98,269	111,157
Sheets:
January, 1920	3,554	3,244	3,108	3,690	5,996	3,929
January, 1919	7,795	2,870	2,664	8,001	3,336	2,635
Total newsprint:
January, 1920	5,474	9,965	9,850	5,589	71,522	78,026
January, 1919	11,057	5,765	5,391	11,431	101,605	113,792

Stocks of rolls on hand at end of January, 1920, exceeded those on hand at the end of December, 1919, by 35 tons, those of sheets by 221 tons, making a net increase of 256 tons.

Commitments to sell roll news exceeded commitments to buy 8,571 tons. Commitments to sell sheet news, however, was 2,067 tons less than the commitments to buy.

PUBLISHERS' TONNAGE.

Monthly tonnage reports from 710 (this number represents a much larger number of publications) of the most important newspaper publishing concerns and associations grouped according to the principal business sections of the United States, together with a separate tabulation for the agricultural publications, show the following results for January, 1920:

Location of publishers.[1]	Number of publications.	On hand first of month.	Received during month.	Used and sold during month.	On hand end of month.	In transit end of month.

[1] New England includes Connecticut, New Hampshire, Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Vermont; the Eastern States include Delaware, the District of Columbia, Maryland, New Jersey, New York, and Pennsylvania; the Northern States include Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, and Ohio; the Southern States include Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, and West Virginia; the Middle West includes Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Idaho, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, North Dakota, Oklahoma, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, Wisconsin, and Wyoming; the Pacific coast includes California, Oregon, and Washington.

[2] The farm papers for the most part use special grades of newsprint instead of standard news.

Publishers' stocks decreased 7,197 tons during the month. This, however, was more than offset by an increase of 8,853 tons in transit over that at the close of December, 1919.

The tonnage used during January was 4,773 tons less than was used during December, 1919.

Publishers' stocks and transit tonnage on January 31 represented slightly more than 35 days' supply at the existing rate of consumption.

Forty-six publishing concerns held about 48 per cent of the tonnage on hand at the end of the month.

MILL PRICES TO PUBLISHERS.

The weighted average price of contract deliveries from domestic mills to publishers during January, 1920, f. o. b. mill in carload lots for standard news in rolls was $4.362 per 100 pounds. This weighted average is based upon January deliveries of approximately 75,000 tons on contracts involving a total tonnage of about one and a half million tons of paper manufactured in the United States. These contracts include a few long-term contracts made prior to the war at very low prices.

The weighted average contract price based on deliveries from Canadian mills of more than 15,000 tons of standard roll news in carload lots f. o. b. mill in January, 1920, was $4.267 per 100 pounds. This weighted average is based upon the January deliveries on contracts involving more than 300,000 tons of Canadian paper. The greater number of these are short-term contracts covering the year 1920.

The weighted average market price for January of standard roll news in carload lots f. o. b. mill based upon domestic purchases totaling more than 14,000 tons was $6.624 per 100 pounds.

OFFICE AND MILL LOCATIONS.

Newsprint mills in the United States.

[This list includes 32 companies and 47 mills with the combined daily capacity of more than 4,000 tons. Mills which run chiefly on other grades and only to a small extent on newsprint are not included in this list. The commission's reports for January showed 66 mills had operated at least one machine on 32-pound newsprint paper used by publishers and 89 mills on all weights of newsprint, including 32-pound paper.]

WASTE.

I am fully aware that there is great extravagance in the use of newsprint paper and this extravagance should be eliminated as far as possible, but this alone is not the immediate cause of the high prices demanded for newsprint paper. The real cause is the control of the supply and of prices. It is mighty easy to offer other excuses as a justification, but such excuses are not substantiated by the facts.

The willful violation of law is a serious matter and those charged with law enforcement can not wink at law violation and permit those who willfully do so to excuse their action on a false premise which will not bear the searchlight of truth. We must not hesitate or balk at the facts. We must meet them squarely and fairly, for we can only look to the facts to determine the cause, and it seems to me that the cause of the high prices for print paper and the discriminatory prices are perfectly evident to every sensible man.

I have been informed, upon what I consider good authority, that English capital has the controlling stock in the paper industry in this country. I have tried to investigate this matter, but as yet have not been able to get the data that I desire. If this is true it is strikingly astounding. Is it possible that the capitalists of England and the United States, in conjunction, are controlling the commercial and industrial interests of this country? Is it possible that the United States is still a colony of Great Britain, notwithstanding the fact that we have already had two wars with England in which we were victorious, the result of which acknowledged our independence?

Gentlemen of the House, I do not hesitate to say that the profits demanded from the owners of the small newspapers throughout the country are so unreasonable and unjust as to be nothing short of robbery. What is the remedy in the premises? Can Congress do anything to relieve this situation? Is the Sherman antitrust law, as enacted in July, 1890, and as amended and supplemented by the Clayton Act in 1916, to be ignored? Does this law fall short of its purpose? Is the penalty therein provided for not sufficient to deter those who seek to violate its provisions? If such is the case this law should be repealed at once and should be superseded by a law that will be effective and accomplish the purpose for which it was enacted. [Applause.]

The small newspapers of this country are in a sense a household necessity. No well-regulated home can afford to be without the local paper, and every home should be supplied with it. It is the medium through which the current local news of the day is conveyed to the members of the household. It carries the personal and business news of the community and the advertising matter of the merchants of the country towns and villages. It carries the ads. of special bargain sales, as well as ads. of sales of personal and real property. It is the arm of the courts in carrying out the processes of the law required to be published. It is the means by and through which public sentiment and public opinion are molded. It is a great public service utility in every community, and there seems to be a general scheme on the part of the newsprint manufacturers' association and its subsidiaries to clean out the small newspapers of the country and thereby force the merchants and business men throughout the country who desire to advertise to carry their advertising matter to the metropolitan papers of the cities and to force the courts to carry all their legal advertising in these great metropolitan papers. It appears to be a concerted move on the part of the newsprint paper combine to concentrate the business of the country in the metropolitan papers and to be able in this way to control the business of the country as well as the politics of the country.

The newspaper business is not built up in a day. It requires years to establish this business. Many men have given the major portion of their lives to the newspaper business, and it is an outrage and a shame to allow this great trust monopoly to destroy their life's work by willful violation of a prohibitive law. If the small newspapers of this country are to be destroyed and put out of business, along with that you will destroy the business of the smaller cities, towns, and villages and the communities surrounding them. The evil effect would be almost incalculable.

Mr. Speaker, it was my purpose to press the resolution which I introduced in this House and which was referred to the Committee on Rules, and have the same passed by the House, if possible. I thought it was necessary to have a complete and thorough investigation of the conduct of these great paper combines in order to give relief to those suffering from its iniquitous practices. However, having had two conversations with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, in which we discussed the propriety of reporting the resolution to the House and having the House act upon it, I reached the conclusion that inasmuch as a secret investigation was now being made and had been carried on for some time by an arm of the Government which has proven effective, it was not necessary to have a further investigation of this matter at this time.

The House passed the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] on Monday of this week, requiring the Interstate Commerce Commission to supply the House with all the data it might have touching the production of newsprint paper and the cause of high prices. I had intended to address the House on that occasion, but inasmuch as there was only an hour's time for debate, I felt that it would be impossible for me to present to this House the facts which I had been able to assemble in relation to this most important subject within the time that I could secure. I further felt that the membership of the House, and the country as well, should know something of the conduct of those engaged in the newsprint paper business in the United States and Canada since 1913.

I want to say further in this connection that I have received a great number of letters from editors, both Democratic and Republican, from different parts of the country, urging that Congress take immediate action to relieve them as the prey of this heartless, soulless, and vicious monster, the International Paper Co., which is slowly but most certainly crushing the owners of the small newspapers of the country and, in many instances, destroying the life's work of honest, upright, and straightforward men who have built up a newspaper business.

I am in favor of a law that will force these newsprint paper corporations to take out a license from the Government before they can engage in business. It is my opinion that in this way we can determine who is engaged in the business, the names of the stockholders, their location, and the relation existing between these various industrial enterprises.

I regret, of course, that this Government is forced to take such action, but, in my humble judgment, there is no other alternative. The Congress of the United States is facing a gigantic problem of monopoly in almost every line of business, and I fear that there is no way to relieve the people of this country from the oppression of monopoly and exaction of unreasonable and outrageous profits except by the imposition of a heavy penalty and confinement in a Federal prison, or by licensing the various corporations who deal in the different lines that affect the welfare of the common people. Whatever the relief may be, it must come and come soon, and it is up to Congress to provide the remedy. I fully appreciate that what is needed most in this country is not law enactment, but law enforcement, and in the immediate years to come law enforcement will have much to do with shaping the destinies of the American people. A monopoly is a breeder of radicalism, Bolshevism, sovietism, communism, I. W. W.ism, and every other imaginable ism, and it must be stamped out. [Applause.]

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS] be allowed to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the inevitable has happened at last, when we find the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN], together with Mr. Samuel Gompers, agreeing with the gentleman from Texas and admitting that what the gentleman from Texas has been contending for so long really exists in the United States. I have stated many times that organized labor, through its improper, autocratic, radical leadership in the United States, is honeycombed with Bolshevism and disloyalty. The matter put in the RECORD a few minutes ago by the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] admits it. When the letter came to me from New York, dated February 2, 1920, signed "Bernard Nolan, president of the New York Printing Pressmen's Union, No. 51," I took it for granted that I should not discard it merely because of its name "Nolan," but that I should give whatever credence to it that upon its face it seemingly deserved. I did not vouch for it. I did not vouch for Mr. Bernard Nolan in presenting it. I merely gave it to the people of the United States for whatever it was worth. Now, at this late date, some labor man named Berry, down in the State of Tennessee, here on the 19th day of March has caused to be read into the RECORD a statement casting aspersions on this Mr. Bernard Nolan of New York, who sent me this letter dated February 2, and which I placed in this RECORD on February 4, 1920, and concerning which not only Mr. Gompers but every labor man in the union, through their recognized mouthpiece on the floor here, had notice.

Who better than Mr. Gompers himself occupies a position embracing a better knowledge of who or what Mr. Bernard Nolan is and the standing of his affiliation with the American Federation of Labor? Yet, since February 4, 1920, when his said letter was published in the RECORD, Mr. Gompers has never seen fit to make any denial of Mr. Bernard Nolan. Should not he know more about Mr. Bernard Nolan in New York than this man Berry down in the State of Tennessee knows?

Now, up in the left-hand corner of the envelope in which Mr. Bernard Nolan mailed his letter is the following:

New York Printing Pressmen's Union, No. 51, I. P. P. & A. U. 31 Union Square, New York. [Union label 36.]

And Mr. Bernard Nolan signed this letter as president of the New York Printing Pressmen's Union, No. 51, and his letterhead upon which his letter was written contains the following heading:

New York Printing Pressmen's Union, No. 51, I. P. P. and A. U. of North America. [Seal.] Affiliated with Allied Printing Trades Council of Greater New York, New York State Allied Printing Trades Council, Central Federated Union of New York City, Central Labor Union of Brooklyn and Queens, New York State Federation of Labor. [Union label 241.] Office, Metropolis Building, 31 Union Square; rooms 1109–1110–1111; telephones, Stuyvesant 7178–7179.

Now, let us examine this letter closely and see whether or not this man was what he was holding himself out to be, and whether he was speaking authoritatively? Examine closely this letterhead upon which his letter was written; quite a distinguished-looking letterhead. Note on the top, in great big letters: "New York Printing Pressmen's Union, No. 51, I. P. P. and A. U. of North America. Office, Metropolis Building, 31 Union Square." Rooms 1109, 1110, 1111 in that building. Telephones, not merely one, but two telephones; Stuyvesant 7178 and 7179.

Also, note on the letterhead—and I call the attention of the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN], who speaks for Mr. Gompers and the labor man in Tennessee, to these statements in great big printed letters:

Affiliated with Allied Printing Trades' Council of Greater New York; affiliated with New York State Allied Printing Trades' Council; affiliated with Central Federated Union of New York City; affiliated with Central Labor Unions of Brooklyn and Queens; affiliated with the New York State Federation of Labor—

With the labor union's seal, "No. 241, of New York," on it, and on the left it has the usual seal that all of us have when we want to show importance to the country. It says:

International Printing Pressmen and Assistants Union of North America. Organized October 8, 1889.

And in this seal it has a Latin phrase, and I had to go to the distinguished Latin scholar of the House to find out what it means, and I understand it means "Acting right, with confidence."

Should not anyone take this letter on its face for what it is worth? Now, what is the letter? I do not blame Mr. Gompers for waiting from February 4 to March 19 to find out that he had to go down into Tennessee to find some labor man down there to try to attack this Mr. Nolan, because it is necessary to make an attack on him, because this letter means something to Mr. Gompers and the things for which he stands as an autocratic leader. But let me read you this letter again, as it was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on February 4, 1920:

NEW YORK, February 2, 1920.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Samuel Gompers is not the true representative of labor or the true ideals of labor. He is now in New York City playing the cheapest kind of peanut politics.

We can not get rid of him, as our method of elections is such that the rank and file of true Americans can not get a crack at him. His old cigar makers' union defeated him, and he was fourth in the race.

If the rank and file of labor could get a referendum vote, he would be removed. I want you to send me a copy of your last speech showing his want of Americanism. If you want some real data to "skin a skunk," I will send you same.

I have no personal grievance against him, but he disgraces honest labor, and with him and his type in the lead labor can never progress properly until it has a house cleaning. We who have a pride in our true Americanism look forward to a proper clean-up of our unions. I hope that I may hear from you soon.

Truly, yours,

BERNARD NOLAN,
President Union No. 51.

And this Mr. Bernard Nolan is now attacked by Mr. Gompers and the gentleman from California and this labor leader down in the State of Tennessee because they say he entered a strike that was not authorized by the American Federation of Labor and which violated a contract. It is very amusing to hear Mr. Gompers attack Mr. Bernard Nolan for an alleged violation of a contract, when this same Mr. Gompers supported the great steel strike, led by the anarchist, William Z. Foster, who acted with approval from Mr. Gompers and who was placed in charge of said strike by Mr. Gompers, when thousands and thousands of said strikers were violating their contracts in striking. It is also amusing to remember that Mr. Gompers supported the coal strike and patted the strikers on the back with approval when they had violated their contracts, and their strike was declared unlawful both by the President and by the courts; yet this same Mr. Gompers, when women and little children were freezing to death, cussed the President, cussed the laws of the United States, claiming that he was immune from the Lever law, which he claimed applied to every other citizen except the ones affiliated with this Mr. Gompers, and when he cussed Judge Anderson and the courts generally and threatened to withdraw his support from the Democratic Party.

And yet Mr. Gompers, through the gentleman from California, now asserts, through a letter from a man down in Tennessee, though waiting to do so until this March 19, 1920, after this letter was put in the RECORD on February 4, that Mr. Bernard Nolan has no connection with the Printing Pressmen's Union of North America and is unworthy because he once struck in violation of a contract. If he has no such connection then this letterhead is a libel on the State of New York; this letterhead is a libel on all these federated unions with which this particular union, of which Mr. Bernard Nolan is president, is affiliated. Why at this late hour is it necessary to come in and say that Mr. Bernard Nolan is a radical; that he is a Bolshevist; that he is in favor of Bolshevism? That is what I have said all the time with respect to these radical labor leaders. I have said they were all full of Bolshevism, from Samuel Gompers down, and Mr. Samuel Gompers and the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] are only backing me up at last in the position I have taken at numerous times on the floor of this House in asserting that there is Bolshevism and there is anarchy, and that there is disloyalty, not in the great mass of good, loyal, working American citizens, who are members of those unions, but in their leaders. Now, does it look nice for Mr. Gompers to say that about Bernard Nolan?

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman from Texas, I am sure, keeps up with these labor activities.

Mr. BLANTON. I have to keep up with them in order to protect the people of this country.

Mr. BLACK. Does he not recall that in the strike of the New York pressmen the American Federation of Labor and the chief officers of the Pressmen's Union refused to countenance the strike on the ground that it was a deliberate violation of their contract? And ought we to stand with the men who were violating the contract by striking, or ought we to stand with the labor leaders who contended they ought not to violate the contract?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not want to stand with either one of them, because I do not want to get in bad company. I am standing for the 110,000,000 people of the United States, first, last, and all the time, who have been the silent sufferers; and if Mr. Bernard Nolan is bolshevistic it carries out the assertion that I have been making, and if Mr. Gompers wants to help me prove my case, he has done it very efficiently and efficaciously. But Mr. Gompers should not jump on Mr. Nolan, of New York, for Bolshevism or for disloyalty and for breaking contracts when Mr. Gompers has stood behind the steel strikers who broke their contracts, and stood behind the coal strikers who broke their contracts, and behind numerous other contract-breaking strikers.

As I said, he stood behind William Z. Foster, who preached revolution in this country. He stood behind him and put him in charge of the steel strike. He stood behind John L. Lewis in the dastardly coal strike, when he was claiming that the President and the Government had promised them immunity from the laws, when he was attacking the courts of the country, and said they would not obey the highest law of the land. Mr. Gompers has a poor cause to attack Mr. Bernard Nolan, of New York, as an anarchist, when he himself has done more to free anarchists from felon cells than almost any other man in the United States, save and except possibly the Secretary of Labor. [Laughter.]

Why, what about his help of the McNamara brothers? Were they not anarchists? What about his raising of the tremendous slush fund for the McNamara brothers, convicted anarchists of this country? What about his standing behind the convicted bomb-throwing anarchist, Mooney, of California? Has any man done more to get that anarchist out of the penitentiary? Did any man do more to save that anarchist from having his neck broken, which he deserves, than the man who now jumps on the president of this printing pressmen's union because he struck? Why does he condemn so severely one man for calling a strike when he has to face the war records of his unions which caused 6,000 strikes in the United States during the war period from the time war was declared on April 6, 1917, until the armistice was signed on November 11, 1918? This is ridiculous, this action of Mr. Gompers in jumping on Mr. Nolan in New York because he wrote this letter down here saying he was not in accord with Mr. Gompers's trying to read him out of a union.

And yet at Atlantic City, at the last convention of the American Fderation of Labor, who sat on that platform with Mr. Gompers and Secretary Wilson? Who spoke from the same platform to the same audience? Mrs. Renie Mooney, the wife of the convicted anarchist, herself indicted for murder in the highest degree in the State of California at that time, and was applauded and spoke from the same platform.

And who marched that great convention from Atlantic City to the Capitol in Washington in protest of the Constitution? Who but Mr. Samuel Gompers, saying that if we did not change the Constitution and give his workers beer and wine—what would he do? He would cause a revolution in this country! That is what he said.

Is Mr. Gompers the man to jump on Mr. Bernard Nolan in New York? Oh, no. And then when we started to pass the railroad bill we were told, even before he got home from Europe, by Mr. Gompers that there would be a revolution unless we adopted this pernicious Plumb plan, which is socialistic and anarchistic. Could anything be more socialistic or bolshevistic or anarchistic than the proposed Plumb plan, that would take $20,000,000,000 of private property from widows and little children whose ancestors had spent lifetimes in its accumulation? He said if we did not do that there would be a revolution in this country. A revolution!

I do not like the idea of having to do it every day, but if it is forced upon me as in this instance, I am prepared to meet all such allegations as that if they come up. I am always here and stay on the floor for that and other purposes. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the absence of a quorum at this hour.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold that? In five minutes we will rise.

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], and as soon as he is through I shall move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, surely no one in this body can accuse me of being a Bolshevist. Every since I have been a Member of this House I have tried to dignify labor. I have recommended that the labor unions follow the straight and the right course, and only a short time ago I took my political life in my hands when I exposed Mr. William Z. Foster during the steel strike, for at that time there were 45,000 men out of work in my district. Mr. William Z. Foster is not the kind of a man who should be at the head of any labor organization in this country, and there are thousands of law-abiding American workingmen—organization men—who share my views in this matter. [Applause.] But, Mr. Chairman, I can not sit still here this afternoon and hear the gentleman from Texas brand every workingman in this country who belongs to a labor union as a Bolshevist.

Mr. BLANTON. I did not do that.

Mr. COOPER. If the gentleman did not do it directly, he did it by implication. He made the statement here that he did not want to be contaminated by associating himself with any man who carried a union card.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; only two.

Mr. COOPER. I want to say to the gentleman from Texas that there are men in this House to-day who belong to labor organizations and are proud of the fact. It seems to me that the gentleman from Texas might find something more worth while to do than to stand on this floor every day and attack the laboring men of this country. At the time that he was making his attack upon labor here a few moments ago, there were millions of men in this country working hard, and by the sweat of their brows and the work of their hands producing the commodities of life. They are running the wheels of industry, tilling the soil, producing the coal, moving the commerce, and while they are doing this the gentleman from Texas takes up hour after hour and day after day here filling the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with his vicious attacks upon labor that has cost the Government of the United States, I should say, up in the neighborhood of $50,000 or $60,000 since the gentleman has been a Member of this body.

The gentleman from Texas says that Mr. Gompers came out and indorsed the Plumb plan. If he did, I do not know anything about it, for he stated in public a short time ago he did not favor Government ownership. I hold no brief for Mr. Gompers. Mr. Gompers and I have not agreed on all things, but I do believe that Mr. Gompers is a patriotic American citizen and that he loves that flag and is just as much interested in the welfare of this country as is the gentleman from Texas. Oh, yes; I know there are certain elements in organized labor to-day that have me marked because I voted for the railroad bill, but that does not mean that all organized labor in this country are Bolshevists and communists, as the gentleman from Texas would have us believe. There are many thousands of law-abiding, honest workingmen in this country who do not believe in Bolshevism or communism, who respect the Constitution of the United States, and love their country. [Applause.] Oh, I wish that the gentleman from Texas would find something else more worth while to do than to stand here on the floor of this House day after day and hour after hour making his attacks upon the laboring men of this land. What has he ever done to help the workingman since he has been a Member of this body?

Mr. BLANTON. The laboring men of my district will tell you.

Mr. COOPER. I decline to yield. The gentleman from Texas day after day attacks labor here, but has he ever done anything for them? No; but he calls them Bolshevists and communists and attacks organized labor almost every day of his life. Has not labor got just the same right to organize as capital in this country?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Bolshevism in our country is not confined to the working classes alone. The gentleman approves of the organization of some of these great capitalistic concerns in this country, but he does not approve of the honest, decent, law-abiding workingmen of this land organizing for their own betterment. As I said, I could not sit still without answering the challenge of the gentleman from Texas. At this time I carry in my pocket a card and a receipt showing that I am a member in good standing of one of the great labor organizations of this country. And let me say to the gentleman from Texas that in 1912 that great labor organization, 85,000 strong, went on record in their convention as standing for the things that are highest, the best, and the noblest things in American life, and I wish that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] would devote a little more of his energy in the interest and welfare of the working classes and try and make their conditions better, instead of making his unfair and unjust attacks upon them every day of his life. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

On motion of Mr. BROWNING the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MANN of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 13108) had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. VESTAL (at the request of Mr. PURNELL), for one day, on account of illness.

To Mr. LANHAM, for to-day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. GOLDFOGLE, indefinitely, on account of illness.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

H. R. 11309. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to fix compensation of certain laborers in the customs service.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. KAHN presented the conference report on the Military Academy appropriation bill (H. R. 12467) for printing in the RECORD under the rule.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until Saturday, March 20, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting request from the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service for supplemental appropriation for the purpose of remodeling buildings turned over to the Treasury Department for the use of the Public Health Service (H. Doc. No. 695), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. COOPER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12889) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Youngstown, Ohio, to construct a bridge across the Mahoning River, at or near Division Street, in the city of Youngstown, Ohio, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 748), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. BARKLEY, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. Give us grace to meet the conditions of life as Thou hast measured them out, with common sense and reason, doing unto others as we would be done by, that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in Jesus Christ our Lord. STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives at a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to H. R. 12467, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report:

On amendments 1, 2, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 74, 76, 77, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, and 90 are all changes of verbiage or phraseology and do not affect the amounts involved in any manner whatever.

On amendment No. 3: Gives the present master of the sword at West Point the pay and allowances of a lieutenant colonel during his incumbency.

On amendment No. 5: Provides a credit of $250 for each cadet now at the academy and to each cadet discharged since January 1, 1919, to the extent of paying any balance due by any such cadet to the academy on account of initial clothing and equipment issued to him. Prior to the war a cadet was usually able to save from his annual allowance during his four years at the academy enough money to pay for the initial clothing and equipment issued to him. During the last two or three years cadets have been graduated in one or two years and therefore were not able to make the necessary saving. Your conferees felt that it was only just to the cadets who graduated under war-time circumstances to agree to the amendment of the Senate.

On amendment No. 18: This amendment provides for the pay of three battalion commanders, at $1,800 per annum, at the academy which were found necessary under the present organization of the Cadet Corps.

On amendment No. 73: Makes the sum appropriated for the completion of eight sets of married officers' quarters immediately available.

On amendment No. 75: Makes the amount appropriated for the completion of 20 sets of bachelor officers' quarters immediately available.

On amendment No. 78: Makes the amount appropriated for the repairs to the old and new cadet hospitals immediately available.

On amendment No. 89: Gives any cadet now at the academy an option, to be exercised prior to June 11, 1920, to continue at the academy one additional year, and postpone thereby his prospective graduation. Cadets not electing so to prolong their course shall be graduated in the years assigned to their respective classes.

On amendment No. 91: Relates to the erection of a hotel at West Point. The present hotel was built in the early part of the nineteenth century. It is entirely out of date, and this amendment authorizes a corporation, company, or individual to enter into a lease for the construction of a modern, new hotel in accordance with plans and specifications to be approved by the Secretary of War and recommended by the Superintendent of the United States Military Academy, the lease to continue for a period of 50 years, at the end of which time the Government shall have the right to acquire said hotel by paying just compensation to the lessees.

On amendment No. 92: Authorizes the appointment of a Panama student, Ramon Ricardo Arias, to receive instruction at the academy. A separate bill in practically the language of the amendment had passed the House.

On amendment No. 93: Provides for the amendment of the law for filling vacancies at the academy, from which the Senate receded.

JULIUS KAHN,
J. W. WISE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. KAHN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I present a privileged report from that committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 495.

Resolved, That the Committee on Education is hereby authorized to investigate the Federal Board for Vocational Education, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to sit during sessions of the House.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, if this resolution is adopted it authorizes the House Committee on Education to investigate the Federal Board of Vocational Education. There is no department of the Government service in Washington in which the Members of the House, the people of the whole country, are more vitally interested than in the rehabilitation of the wounded soldiers. [Applause.] There is no part of the Government service for which we appropriate money more freely and are more interested in and willing to do our utmost to make that service a success than this service of rehabilitation. It is our honest desire and purpose to rehabilitate these wounded soldiers and put them back in productive walks of life as soon as possible. That is our only desire in presenting these resolutions at this time. Of late a good many complaints have been made to the Committee on Education of the House, and some of these are of such a nature that the committee itself feels that the House can ill afford at this time not to consider them. The Committee on Education is unanimous in its request for this rule. The Board for Vocational Education itself has written a letter to Dr. FESS, the chairman of the committee, requesting this investigation in order that they may put themselves right before the country.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Is this investigation prompted by the large circular sent out to Members of Congress?

Mr. SNELL. I would say to the gentleman that I do not know anything about the circular, because I never received one; at least, it has never been called to my attention. I have not heard that that is one of the reasons. The Committee on Education say these complaints have been made to it and that committee has made a partial investigation, and while a great many of these complaints did not amount to very much, there are some that the committee feels should receive consideration by Congress.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The request which the committee made for an investigation was prompted by the circular, was it not?

Mr. SNELL. I can not tell the gentleman, as I am not on the committee, and such information has never come to me.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Has the gentleman any information as to the nationality of the man making those statements?

Mr. SNELL. No; I have not.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. In a moment. I desire simply to make one more statement, that as far as the Committee on Rules is concerned, as far as the Committee on Education is concerned, the only thing that prompts this investigation is a desire for increased efficiency in the service and a desire to do everything in our power to facilitate the work of rehabilitating the wounded soldiers. That is the only thing that is behind the investigation, as far as I know. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I am in full accord with the sentiments just expressed by the gentleman, and I feel sure every Member in the House is. We are all anxious to help the soldiers in every way possible. I have during the war and since done everything I could for them and expect to continue to do so. I understand this resolution simply authorizes the regular standing Committee on Education in the House of Representatives to make this investigation and sit during the sessions of the House. It does not create any separate special committee and does not require any additional expense. We want to spend the money for the boys and not for unnecessary investigations. If the regular committee is to make it, that is all right.

Mr. SNELL. I would say to the gentleman that it authorizes the regular House Committee on Education to make the investigation, and the only expense that it is expected will be incurred in connection with the investigation is perhaps to pay the expenses of some of the soldier witnesses.

Mr. CANDLER. Whatever expense of that kind is incurred no one can object to, and I do not object to that expenditure, but, on the contrary, I favor it. This is the unanimous report of the Committee on Rules as well as the unanimous report of the Committee on Education, and also the desire of the Board for Vocational Education.

Mr. SNELL. It is unanimous, as far as I know, all along down the line.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Lamkin is at the present time the head of this Vocational Board. There is no more capable, efficient, hard-working, honest, or patriotic man in the Government service, and I know he wants to do everything possible under the law for the wounded and maimed soldier. The cause for this criticism, I am sure has not arisen during his administration. If any cause occurred before for criticism, I know he will be glad to receive any help to correct any injustice done to any soldier.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me 20 minutes, to be parceled out as I desire?

Mr. SNELL. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina, to be used as he sees fit.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, everyone agrees that the Nation has no more sacred trust than the care of the wounded ex-service men. If the charges made against the Vocational Board are true, an investigation ought to be had, and inasmuch as the Vocational Board very much desires to have the investigation it would seem the resolution should be adopted without division.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DONOVAN].

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, perhaps a little preliminary history of how the request of the Committee on Education came to be made for this resolution might be in order. At the end of February, or on March 1, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED], whom we all respect, submitted to the House a resolution to investigate what was purported to be the "hard-boiled" order which was printed in a display sheet of the New York Evening Post, which paper is making a feature in, written by a Mr. Littledale, a special correspondent. This alleged order purported to have been issued by the Vocational Board, and it contains anything but the ideals for which the board was established or the manner in which rehabilitation work was to be administered. The committee was shocked by the statement of the gentleman from New York, and upon his statement that what he knew had been told to him by a correspondent, the committee, on account of Mr. HUSTED's representations, invited Mr. Harold Littledale, the correspondent of the New York Evening Post, to come before the committee. On the 2d day of March Mr. Littledale did appear before the committee. He was examined by the several members of the committee. It developed that this alleged "hard-boiled" order was a circular that Mr. Littledale, in answer to questions asked him by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], said had no direct connection with the Federal Board for Vocational Education. It bore no date line of Washington, nor did it have the signature of anyone attached to it. When it came down to a final analysis Mr. Littledale admitted to Mr. DALLINGER that this circular and alleged order, so far as he knew, was not issued by this board, but the best that he could say was that it came from there. He refused to give the name of the person who gave him the information. In one instance he said he got it in Washington, and in another instance he said he got it in Atlanta. In one instance he said he procured it from a man, and in another instance he said he procured it from a woman. When Mr. Littledale refused to give the information and further stated that he was protecting the man the committee decided to ask the House for the authority which this resolution will grant. On March 12, during the examination, in the ordinary way I chanced to ask Mr. Littledale a question in respect to his own history. I had no knowledge of him; I had never seen him before then. In answer to my question whether he was a citizen of the United States he answered that he was not. He is an alien. He is a citizen of Great Britain, although he has been a resident of the United States for 14 years. After Mr. HUSTED had made his statement to the committee on March 2, realizing the soldiers' interest and the desire of our Government to do all and everything particularly for our disabled soldiers, it was my privilege to move the investigation of the Vocational Board of Education, and later, on the 13th of March, when we had a night session, in the open session of the committee and later in the executive session of the Committee on Education, on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING], again it was my privilege to second his motion requesting the House to give the Committee on Education the right to subpœna witnesses and to hold hearings during the session and all attendant authority given in this resolution now under consideration, which I heartily support and urge its adoption, so that a complete and searching investigation can be had. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield me three minutes more?

Mr. POU. I am very sorry, but the time has been parceled out.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS].

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, usually I pay no attention to newspaper articles, not because I underestimate their worth or their power to do harm, but because I have not the time to do so. I notice that in the New York Evening Post of Thursday there is the following:

FESS hopes for speedy action.

And down further on I see that the Hon. CHAMP CLARK and Mr. CALDWELL and Representative SEARS and a few other Democrats are opposing this investigation. This is the New York Evening Post. I can not believe that the Post intentionally intends to do myself or the ex-Speaker or any Member an injustice. I believe Dr. FESS will bear me out in the assertion that the committee has been unanimous for an investigation, but there was some disagreement as to how the investigation should be conducted. I assisted in passing the first rehabilitation act, that was known as the Smith-Sears bill, trying to assist the soldiers. It was my pleasure recently to assist Dr. FESS in passing another rehabilitation bill, and I am sure that neither Dr. FESS nor myself want to avoid an investigation, but, on the contrary, would like to get at the facts. This paper would indicate that some politics is trying to be made out of it. I do not believe there is any politics in the Committee on Education, and I am sure the committee will go to the bottom of it if the House will give us the authority.

In 1918 I urged that we have investigations as fast as expenditures were made. But the House by a vote of 248, I believe, to ninety and some odd disagreed with me, and as a result since last May we have been doing nothing but investigating. Of course, the money is gone and we can not hope to get it back.

With these few remarks, and again repeating that as far as I know on the Democratic side there is no objection to an investigation, either on the part of the members of the Rules Committee or on the part of the Committee on Education——

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. I yield.

Mr. GARRETT. As I understand, the publications made in the paper from which the gentleman is quoting are largely responsible for bringing about the condition that necessitated this investigation. Now, I have not read the article from which the gentleman has just quoted, but if there be any intimation in it that the minority of the Committee on Rules or of the House has in any way retarded this investigation, I should say that it would cast some suspicion upon the accuracy of its statement which did bring about the investigation.

Mr. SEARS. In answer to the gentleman from Tennessee, I will say I am satisfied that Dr. FESS will bear out everything I have said. I will leave it to the gentleman from Ohio to either disagree with my statement or verify it. He is chairman of the committee. I happened to be chairman of it before, and I will again say that I am satisfied the reporter——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED].

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. DONOVAN] has said, the reason why I introduced my resolution was because my attention was called, by the circular sent out by the New York Evening Post, to the existence of this so-called "hard-boiled" order. I had for a long time been of the opinion that the Federal Board for Vocational Education was utterly unfit to administer its great trust. I was convinced that the men in charge of it had no business training and were not qualified to expend this money to the advantage of the Government or for the benefit of the soldiers. I remember that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, stated on the floor of this House, when some appropriation bill was up for consideration, that in all his experience he had never met any public men, charged with the administration of a great trust, who seemed to have so little conception of the nature of their duties and of the great responsibilities with which they were charged as this same Board for Vocational Education. While I was convinced of the inefficiency of the board, and while I believed that an investigation of their activities would be productive of more good than any congressional investigation in progress, I was still more shocked by the apparently calloused and indifferent attitude of these men toward this question, as evidenced by this "hard-boiled" order. I consulted the chairman of the rehabilitation division with regard to it, and he said that the "hard-boiled" order had not been sent out, but he gave me a copy of a circular of instructions which was actually sent out by the board, the so-called "hard-boiled" order in deleted form, and in that circular are these statements:

HELPFUL HINTS FOR CENTRAL OFFICE CASE BOARD REPRESENTATIVES.

1. As representatives of the central office case board you are to give individual rulings on individual cases. General rulings originate at central office. Don't make any yourself.
2. You are to pass on cases, and whenever you think out loud see that the thought is placed on paper and is then placed in the man's folder.
3. Don't argue with the district office staff. Tell them to write central office if they don't like your judgment.
4. Don't speculate. If a fact exists, the existence of the fact can be proved on a piece of paper. Accept legal proof, and don't trust to hearsay evidence. If any member of a district staff knows a lot more about a case than is in the folder, tell him to dictate it and get the D. V. O. to sign it. Don't listen to him. It wastes time.
5. The organs used in approving cases are the eyes and the brain.
6. Don't gossip. If a man tells you a tale of woe in one district, don't tell it in the next district. You are not sent out to arrange salary readjustments or to install filing systems, but to approve cases.
7. Keep your opinions to yourself. If you believe one section is more efficient than another section or one district more efficient than another, keep it to yourself.
8. Members of the district office staffs will beat you over the head with verbal pressure. District pressure causes many of our mistakes. Put cotton in your ears and lock the door.
9. District office staffs believe that anyone from central office is full of wisdom. You will preserve this good impression if you don't talk.
10. Whenever you draw a conclusion draw it in duplicate and forward one copy to central office.
11. Accept advice from central office. Take all the cigarettes you can get from members of the district office staff but no advice. The district office will never crawl you for approving cases in error, but central office will. Don't get mad when you get crawled, but come back with the evidence. If the evidence wasn't there—don't do it again.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. Who signed the paper the gentleman is reading from?

Mr. HUSTED. This paper was given to me. It was not signed by anybody, but it purports to come from the central office here in Washington, and it was given to me by the chief of the rehabilitation division of the Federal board.

Mr. KING. Would the gentleman know his name?

Mr. HUSTED. I know his name. His name is Mr. Lamkin.

Mr. SEARS. It is charged by Mr. Littledale that that is the "hard-boiled" order, and that it was never signed. I would like to know if the gentleman has proof to the contrary. If that is not the "hard-boiled" order, the House would like to know it.

Mr. HUSTED. The "hard-boiled" order, as published by the New York Evening Post, contains something more than is included in this circular. This is, as I was told by Mr. Lamkin, a deleted form of the "hard-boiled" order.

Mr. SEARS. It is practically in those words.

Mr. DONOVAN. I wondered if the gentlemen knew if Mr. DALLINGER, in the examination of Mr. Littledale, got these replies:

Mr. DALLINGER. Was there any heading showing it came from some officer in Washington?
Mr. LITTLEDALE. Not on that specific order; no, sir.
Mr. DALLINGER. Was there any date on it?
Mr. LITTLEDALE. I think not.
Mr. DALLINGER. Was there anything on it to indicate that it came from any place?
Mr. LITTLEDALE. I think not, sir.
Mr. DALLINGER. So far as you can recall, the words "Washington, D. C.," were on it?
Mr. LITTLEDALE. I think not.
Mr. DALLINGER. Was it signed by anybody?
Mr. LITTLEDALE. No, sir.
Mr. DALLINGER. Then, it was not signed by the Vocational Board?
Mr. LITTLEDALE. No, sir.
Mr. DALLINGER. Simply a typewritten memorandum. Is that right? Not addressed to any particular person or signed by anyone?
Mr. LITTLEDALE. The sheet was not addressed; no, sir.
Mr. DALLINGER. Was it all on one sheet.
Mr. LITTLEDALE. I believe it was, sir.
Mr. DALLINGER. What kind of paper was it on? Thick paper, like that, or carbon paper?
Mr. LITTLEDALE. I don't want this to be traced to the man, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. POU. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I expect to vote for this resolution. As I understand, there will be no opposition to its adoption from any quarter. Since the inception of this program for the retraining of our disabled soldiers, I have taken a keen and lively interest in its successful operation. This Federal board, in handling this problem, has been confronted with very unusual and difficult problems.

In addition to the ordinary administrative features of a new enterprise of this sort they have had to contend with numerous psychological aspects of the situation arising from the state of mind of the wounded soldiers. They ask for this investigation, along with the committee.

I trust that when this resolution is adopted all those charges will be probed to the bottom. There should be no politics in this matter. It is not a question susceptible to lines of political cleavage. Dr. Prosser, the former director of the board for two years, is a Republican. James P. Munroe, the acting vice chairman, as I understand, is a member of the Republican Party. The question we want to solve here under this resolution is one if possible for the ultimate benefit of these soldiers themselves, and I trust that this investigation upon the part of the committee will not only disclose the fact but will prompt the committee to go further than the words of the resolution itself, and make positive recommendations to the House with reference to what facts they ascertain to be true or untrue in connection with this matter, so that if any man in a position of responsibility on that board is found to be incompetent, he should be removed and some competent man placed in his stead.

Now, gentlemen, in the time I have left I want to call your attention to another matter. If you Members of the majority here on the floor of this House, of the steering committee and the Rules Committee, are really anxious to do something for the benefit of the men who are taking this vocational training, I respectfully urge upon you the immediate consideration of the provisions of the bill introduced in the House some time ago by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARROW], providing for an increased amount to be allowed to the wounded soldiers for their living expenses while undergoing training. We had a thorough investigation of that proposition before our committee. These wounded men from many sections of the country came before the committee and developed a pitiable condition, many of them, with reference to the absolute impossibility of their getting along with the present allowances; and after hearing their claims, the committee, Democrats and Republicans alike, unanimously voted to report the Darrow bill, and urged that it be called to the attention of the Committee on Rules, so that a rule might be provided for if possible to bring it up for consideration on the floor of this House for action. I urge now upon those of you who are in authority and really anxious for some action for the benefit of disabled soldiers, although I believe this investigation should be ordered, those of you who are anxious to accomplish some direct result, that you should see to it that a rule is brought in for the consideration of the Darrow bill in order that we may take action upon it. I make this appeal on behalf of our distressed disabled men.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BRAND. Mr. Speaker, I only rose because of the question of accuracy of the published articles raised by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] and for the purpose of keeping the record straight in regard to the statement of the New York Evening Post. As to the vote upon the motion to have this investigation as reported March 15 by that reporter—either a man or a woman, and I am inclined to think it was a woman—it states that JEROME F. DONOVAN, Democrat, New York; CHARLES H. BRAND, Democrat, Georgia; WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, Democrat, Alabama; and WILLIAM J. SEARS, Democrat, Florida, were against an investigation, and that EDWARD J. KING, Republican, Illinois, and EDMUND PLATT, Republican, New York, were uncertain on that, and that HORACE M. TOWNER, Republican, Iowa; S. E. BURROUGHS, Republican, New Hampshire; and WILLIAM L. NELSON, Democrat, Missouri, were absent.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. I have never seen the article just read by the gentleman, but I will ask the gentleman if it was not upon my motion that the investigation was had?

Mr. BRAND. It was. I am calling attention to the fact of the inaccuracy of the reporter. Not a single, solitary one named there as being against is against the investigation. All of us, including myself, are in favor of it, and I am inclined to think that both Mr. KING and Mr. PLATT are in favor of the investigation. Whoever gave out this report from the executive session of the meeting of the Committee on Education either gave it out inaccurately or the reporter did not know what she was talking about.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. BRAND. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Was it not a fact that on March 1 the Husted resolution was reported, and our committee took it up on March 2, and that on March 2, after hearing the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED], I made a motion to investigate the board, and on March 13 seconded the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] to request the Congress to give to the Committee on Education the authority which is embodied in the resolution reported from the Rules Committee and now being considered by the House? That was on the 2d of March?

Mr. BRAND. That is true.

Mr. DONOVAN. And was it not the unanimous action of the committee that this rule be requested and authority under it be granted to the committee?

Mr. BRAND. Yes. The Husted resolution was introduced on the 1st, and we took jurisdiction of it on the 2d and held our first hearing on the 2d of March.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think justice to the witness, Littledale, demands a statement that the RECORD will clearly show that he claimed to have first heard of the "hard-boiled order" from a lady in Washington; but that he first received a copy of same from a man in Atlanta.

There is nothing to confuse in that statement. Director Lamkin, who has charge of this rehabilitation board and the work itself, admitted before our committee that the substance of this "hard-boiled order" had been promulgated and handed to him for approval by an employee in the office, but that he had blue-penciled it, and that it has never been put into effect.

So much for the "hard-boiled order." As to charges against the board, the witness, Littledale, brought before our Committee on Education 26 different specifications in writing; specifications tending to show improper action by the board. For each one of these specifications he gave us means of producing proof, as he termed it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I am sorry I can not yield, as I have only a few minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for this not to be taken out of my time, Mr. Speaker, because I can not yield. Mr. Littledale gave us references to the hearings on various appropriation bills where members of the board testified. He gave us the pages of the hearings and the substance of their evidence, and he gave us also the names and addresses of 27 different living witnesses whom he said would testify to certain facts sustaining the charges. I think justice to this witness should cause this statement, that he did back up his charges by sufficient proof to put the Committee on Education on inquiry and on notice of these matters, and there was nothing else left to be done by our committee but to have an investigation. In the committee I took this position and insisted that all of these 26 specified charges should be investigated fully, as a safeguard to our disabled service men.

For instance, Mr. Littledale gave us the names of witnesses, crippled soldiers by whom he said it could be proved that when they went into the office and asked for a proper hearing as to whether or not they should be given training, they were set aside with very little courtesy to wait, when no other soldiers were ahead of them, and things of that kind. Now I take it that we ought to be fair to the man who brings this evidence before us. I might add that it was my question which brought forth the information that the witness was a citizen of England and not of this country, and that he had lived in the United States 14 years and made a living here, and had taken no steps to become a citizen of the United States, but this fact is no excuse for our committee to ignore his charges, when they make out a prima facie case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SNELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] if he desires to use it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, there have been fugitive charges from various sources in the country, some in the form of personal testimony and others in the form of written statements in the papers, that have called considerable attention to the rehabilitation work. The climax of these charges was reached when the New York Evening Post published a series of six articles making specific charges. These six articles served as the basis for editorial comment throughout the country. My own home paper editorially criticized the board very severely. It seemed to me and it seemed to the committee that those charges were sufficiently grave, because they had served as the basis of very adverse comment throughout the country, to make it desirable to call to Washington the witness who made the charges. By authority of the Committee on Education the chairman sent a telegram to the New York Evening Post requesting the appearance of Mr. Littledale here, as he had made the charges. Mr. Littledale came and was put through a very grilling examination, almost as if the Committee on Education were taking the position of prosecutor. That was not done with any adverse spirit toward him, but only because the work of rehabilitation is so vastly important and these charges were so grave that we wanted to qualify the witness first before we asked the House to authorize a complete investigation. Personally I think the witness made rather a strong case. Of the 26 charges many amounted to nothing, but a charge like this—that the Board for Vocational Training has abandoned its post of duty—is too severe to pass over. Another one was that the board had completely broken down; and another was that one of the grave faults was not of fact but of law, that the law under which the board was operating required no responsibility to anyone, but simply to Congress, and the charges went both to facts and law.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I understand no more time will be yielded to the gentleman from Ohio, and in view of the statement that I did this, and that it would be verified by the gentleman from Ohio, I would like to know if I have in any way obstructed an investigation?

Mr. FESS. I think the gentleman is too sensitive in regard to this. So far as I know the gentleman has obstructed no investigation, and no Member, either Democrat or Republican, has obstructed it. The matter is too grave to allow anybody's personal sensitiveness to enter into this thing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FESS. May I have one minute?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman one minute.

Mr. FESS. The committee asked the House to give us sufficient authority to bring the witnesses before this committee and put them under oath and go into this investigation and make it absolutely thorough, nonpartisan, and only in the interest of the public service. I think that the Democrats on the committee are just as unanimous as the Republicans are in requesting this, and if you give it, the investigation will be as thorough as we can make it. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York moves the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes were 128, noes none.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the House having divided, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum present. Clearly there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors; the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees. Those in favor of the adoption of the resolution will as their names are called answer yea, those opposed nay, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 285, answered "present" 1, not voting 141, as follows:

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would vote "aye," but I am paired with the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK]. I therefore answered "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks on the resolution just agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. O'CONNELL, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence on account of the illness of his wife.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13108, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MANN of Illinois in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 13108, a bill making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I was very much interested a moment ago, when you were considering the resolution authorizing an investigation of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, to see the minority side of this House vote unanimously in favor of the investigation and declare that they all were anxious to have this board investigated. I recall when the special Committee on Expenditures in the War Department was created by action of this House that then practically the same unanimity of opinion was observed. Since that time, Mr. Chairman, the minority of this House have sought by almost every means possible to block action of the investigating committee and have complained bitterly every time a report or speech on the floor of the House has been made giving the House and the country the results of the investigation.

I believe congressional investigations of the expenditures of great sums of money we appropriate are wholesome. Surely if no extravagance, inefficiency, or crookedness were uncovered, mistakes would be pointed out and their repetition probably avoided. Every time that waste, extravagance, inefficiency, and faithlessness in public service, in connection with the conduct of the recent World War, has been pointed out by the special Committee on Expenditures in the War Department the defenders of the administration have said, "Oh, we were in a great war. We were in a hurry. War is waste. It could not be avoided."

Now, in the brief time assigned to me I want to call your attention to a recent extravagant and ill-advised expenditure that can not be brushed aside with the statement that it occurred during the war. I venture to say that very few men on the floor of this House, no matter how industrious or energetic they may be, are familiar with the manner in which the War Department has been handling the funds intrusted to it since the armistice was signed. We have a deficiency in the Treasury to-day amounting to $3,000,000,000. The taxpayers are groaning under the burden of taxation, and we are at a loss to know where we are to raise not only the deficiency but the tremendous sums that we will be required to spend in the near future.

Notwithstanding the fact that we are indebted $24,000,000,000 and that we have a deficiency of $3,000,000,000 and that future appropriation bills are going to be so large as to stagger the Nation, the Secretary of War has gone right on spending recklessly and lavishly and unnecessarily the funds appropriated with which to conduct the war. Out of a war appropriation for the purposes of buying ordnance to fight the Hun, the Secretary of War, the other day, in spite of the protests of the Quartermaster General, purchased 75 new trucks at an average cost of about $8,000 per vehicle, or a total of $577,000. The truck is known as the Militor tractor or truck, and it is claimed that it is bought for the purpose of pulling the 155-millimeter guns, notwithstanding the fact, as I shall show you in a moment, that we have enough of such tractors, to say nothing of trucks, to pull enough 155-millimeter guns to equip an army of 10,000,000 men.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I regret that I can not yield to the gentleman nor to any other gentleman, because I only have a short time.

Just let me give you some of the details of this remarkable purchase at this most unpropitious time. In the fall of 1917 Gen. Pershing, realizing the great demand that was to be made for trucks, requested that the War Department standardize a truck suitable for hauling artillery. Conference after conference was held, but the truck interests and the spare-parts interests raised a purse to fight the proposition with, and the trucks or tractors suitable for pulling artillery were never standardized.

In 1918 Gen. Goethals called a conference of the different branches of the War Department to determine whether the Militor truck should be purchased in great quantities. The conference being hopelessly divided, Gen. Goethals directed that a large order of about 25,000 Nash-Quad trucks be ordered, notwithstanding the fact that they had been condemned in the American Expeditionary Forces. Finally, just before the armistice, 1,000 Militor trucks were ordered by the Motor Transport Corps and the contract was let with the Packard Co. and the Militor Corporation.

Prior to this time the Government had purchased six Militor truck-tractors. One of them was sent to France and did good work on the battle front. It has since been returned to this country. One of them made the transcontinental trip in the truck display; another one of them is on the Mexican border, and the others are now in this country. Every conceivable test has been given them. Everybody familiar with them knows how much they will pull, how much they will carry, how fast they will travel, what their clearance is, and everything about them, and yet the chief of the Purchase, Storage and Traffic Division now states that these 75 trucks have been purchased for experimental purposes. We have had 6 of them for experimental purposes since 1918, and if more were necessary why did we not complete a portion of the order for 1,000 that was placed in the fall of 1918? The order for 1,000 was canceled before the manufacture or delivery of a single truck had been completed, and yet, to my astonishment, I learn that the War Department paid these concerns, for indemnity for cancellation of the contract, more than $500,000. Following this, in the spring of 1919, the Westervelt Board recommended the purchase of 150 Militor trucks. The order slips and procurement sheets started on their way through the different branches of the War Department. When they reached the Quartermaster General, Gen. Rogers, no doubt he felt as I do, and as I am sure you gentlemen would feel, that it was a useless, unnecessary extravagance, and so, Mr. Chairman, he wrote to the Secretary of War a letter, of which the following is an exact copy:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR OF PURCHASE AND STORAGE,
Washington, October 11, 1919.

From: The Quartermaster General of the Army, Director of Purchase and Storage.
To: The Secretary of War, through the assistant chief of staff, Director of Purchase, Storage and Traffic.
Subject: Purchase of motor-truck chasses.

1. I feel it my duty to call your attention to the two accompanying requisitions from the Motor Transport Corps, made by direction of the Equipment Division of the General Staff and approved by the Purchase, Storage and Traffic Division of the General Staff, for one hundred and fifty 3-ton Militor truck chasses at $8,000 each, amounting to $1,200,000. Their immediate purchase is directed.

2. While, from a military viewpoint, the purchase of this possibly more modern chassis to motorize artillery might appear advantageous, the fact remains that there are on hand, surplus, a large number of 3-ton truck chasses which, while not actually the same as the type requested, could no doubt be used for the purposes for which these Militor chasses are requested.

3. In view of the large surplus of chasses available, and that appropriations for the fiscal year are barely sufficient to meet current needs, it is my opinion that the proposed expenditure can not be reasonably justified, and it is recommended that the purchase be not made at this time.

4. I have issued instructions suspending the purchase in question pending your further instructions in the matter.

(Signed) H. L. ROGERS,
Quartermaster General, United States Army.
Director of Purchase and Storage.

He knew that we had more trucks and tractors than we knew what to do with, and that for some reason the War Department was keeping trucks and motor vehicles off the market, so as not to compete with the product of our manufacturers. He knew we had the best tractors in the world for pulling heavy artillery, and so he advised against the purchase. I have not been able to fathom what strange influence these motor corporations have with the Secretary of War. What kind of mesmerism do they use upon him? What spells do they work upon our Secretary? Secretary Baker, having the procurement slip before him for 150 trucks and the letter of the Quartermaster General advising against the purchase, makes a dogfall of the matter, and orders that 75 of these trucks be purchased, at $8,000 per truck, and $100,000 spare parts. This order has gone through the War Department and the contract has been let to the Militor Corporation. The procurement slip for the other 75 is still waiting for further action in the War Department.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes; for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. How many trucks of this kind does the gentleman say we have?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I will get to that in a moment.

The Secretary of War says that they are needed to pull the 155-millimeter guns, the same guns, gentlemen, which we pulled in France in the Great War. We pulled them with tractors which we now have and which were admitted to be the best which were in the allied service. Gen. Burr says that they were bought for experimental purposes. The Secretary of War says that they were bought to equip certain units of the Artillery for use with the Army. Now, how many 155-milimeter guns do you think it takes to equip an army of 300,000 men, which we now propose to have? Col. L. B. Moody testified before a committee of this Congress that it takes 500 of such guns to equip an army of a million men. One hundred and fifty would certainly equip an army of 300,000 men. One hundred and fifty tractors will pull 150 guns. In this one purchase Mr. Baker bought enough tractors to pull one-half of the 155-millimeter guns required for the new Army. Now, if we had no trucks nor tractors in this country belonging to the Government, we might say that the Secretary of War was right, but the same Col. Moody testified that we had 6,800 of the best tractors, not trucks but tractors, that were used by the Allies in the Great War. Some of them went into the war and have been returned to this country. Most of them were never used and are in this country to-day. Six thousand eight hundred tractors, if we were looking to the pulling of 155-millimeter guns alone, is sufficient number to equip an army of more than 13,000,000 men. We have enough splendid trucks capable of pulling artillery and especially fitted for hauling ammunition to equip an army of 10,000,000 men, as far as ordnance is concerned, and yet, gentlemen of the House, the Secretary of War authorized just last December, and the contract has just been consummated, the purchase and expenditure as follows: Military trucks for $577,000, spare parts for $126,000; but that is not all. The Secretary of War brags on this tractor because it has a high clearance, and just yesterday I was informed that an order is about to be made and is ordered to be made changing the specification of the tractor—the same tractor that has been in the mind of the War Department since 1917, a thousand of which were ordered in 1918, and the specifications are being changed now. Does not that remind you of the change in specifications of the Liberty motor, of ships, of machine guns, and other war paraphernalia that we were so sorely in need of in time of the war? The change in specifications required the wheels of this tractor-truck to be 4 inches higher.

It is agreed that we will pay the Militor people for this change an additional $89 per vehicle, or $6,675, but making this change in the size of the wheel required the ordering of nonstandard tires. The old tire, 36 by 7, was a standard tire. The new tire now must be 40 by 8, and the new contract is just being let for $30,000 worth of 40-by-8 tires, and as the years go on a special make of nonstandard tires will be called for at exorbitant prices.

What did we pay for the six trucks we already have? It is in testimony before a committee of this Congress that the six trucks we purchased and now own cost $299,000. This is the sum which we paid to the Militor Corporation. Now, let us total up—$577,000 for trucks, $6,670 for changes in specifications, $30,000 for extra tires, $126,000 for spare parts, $25,000 war tax, $299,000 for the six tractors we have already, and the $500,000 for the indemnity for cancellation of the contract for 1,000 tractors makes a total of over $1,563,000. Now, that is just one little paragraph in the volume of the story of the War Department's extravagant truck adventures.

Some one will ask, "Where does the Secretary get his authority and with what appropriation did he make this purchase?" Why, gentlemen of the House, this sum of $764,000 is to come out of an appropriation made by Congress in time of war to purchase ordnance with which to whip the Kaiser. The Kaiser now is in solitary confinement in Holland and the Imperial German Empire is in the throes of a terrible revolution, and the money that we appropriated to conquer him with is being passed out to favorite motor manufacturers in the United States, and it was testified, in substance, that this contract had to be let when it was and hurried along before the appropriation elapsed on the 30th day of June, 1920. The Secretary of War did not risk coming to Congress and asking them for an appropriation to buy trucks with, because he knew that Congress would not give him its consent. No Appropriation Committee nor Military Affairs Committee of either House or Senate was consulted with reference to this expenditure, and none of them knew of it until after it was made. What do you think the taxpayers of the country are going to think about this kind of business? Do you believe that as long as the ordnance and the quartermaster depots and all the fields adjacent to them are full of trucks and tractors suitable for every war purpose and emergency, they are going to be willing to see their Government further bankrupted by this character of unjustifiable and almost criminal extravagance?

I am willing to concede that as far as I am able to judge the Militor truck is a little better than any truck that was ever made, and if we had had an efficient War Department we would have had them in France during the big drive of 1918. We did not have them, but we made others at tremendous cost, and we have them now, and they are admitted to be the best used in winning the Great War. Now, in a time of profound peace, when we are trying to stagger out from under the tremendous burden of debt that is upon us, in the name of common sense, some one tell me why we should continue to buy war paraphernalia when we have many times more on hand at present than can possibly be used.

Now, I believe, gentlemen, I have called your attention to a statement of facts that can not be denied and that we are agreed that this expenditure is unjustifiable, and I do not think there is a man in this House that will attempt to justify it with the same answer as is made to the charge of other extravagances; that it was the result of war and that war is waste. I hope calling attention to these facts will not only have a wholesome effect upon the War Department, yet I have about lost hope that exposure and criticism will check the orgies of waste, extravagance, and inexcusable looting of the Treasury on the part of the Secretary of War, but I do have some hope that this one lesson, together with hundreds of other similar cases, will prompt Congress to so frame its appropriation bills in the future that money appropriated for a given purpose will be used only for that purpose, so that the intentions of Congress in making the appropriation shall be carried out, even though in some instances it may handicap those who desire to spend the money.

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I will.

Mr. BAER. Could Congress pass a resolution immediately cutting off the use of the war fund from now until June 30?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I think so, but this contract has already been let, and we are bound.

I have some pictures here of the Militor truck-tractor if any of you gentlemen of the House care to see them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this bill carries $425,000,000. Frankly, I had hoped that we could see our way clear and the committee would find it possible to support the Navy for the coming fiscal year with a somewhat smaller expenditure. I am not sufficiently familiar with the items of this bill to be able to say just where reductions might be made or ought to be made, but I am rather hopeful that during the discussion members of the committee themselves may find places here and there where they can reasonably and properly agree to reductions. At any rate, I do hope that whatever happens to the bill here—and I am sure there will be no appreciable increases—that there will be no increases elsewhere or hereafter. Four hundred and twenty-five million dollars is a good deal of money, although it does not seem as large a sum as it once did.

I have been somewhat interested in examining the expenditures of some of the great nations of the world for their military establishments prior to the war. Great Britain, with a navy far greater than ours, expended on its navy in 1911, in round figures, $211,000,000, just about half what we are proposing to spend on our Navy the coming year. The year that saw the beginning of the European war, when Great Britain was speeding up and making preparations, she spent only $237,000,000 on her navy. Germany, with her ambition for conquest and with it her desire to build up a great naval establishment, appropriated only $112,000,000 for her navy the year of the war, the war she planned and purposed, $107,000,000 two years before, and $109,000,000 the year before the war. We are proposing to spend a little more than four times as much on our Navy in the next fiscal year as Germany spent on her navy just before the outbreak of the European war, or, to put it in another way, as much as she spent in the four years preceding the Great War, when her sea captains undoubtedly had in mind what they hoped would transpire, the coming of the day when they should unleash the dogs of war.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I think such a speech on such an important subject, by the distinguished majority leader, should have more Members here to hear it. If he wants a quorum, I will get it for him.

Mr. MONDELL. I will ask the gentleman not to demand a quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. In deference to the gentleman's wishes, I will not make it.

Mr. MONDELL. I have so high an opinion of the gentlemen here present, that I do not insist on having a larger number here.

Mr. KAHN. Can the gentleman give the committee any information as to the pay England and Germany allowed their officers and men in their respective navies?

Mr. MONDELL. I have tried to get those figures accurately. I hope to have them accurately within a day or two, but I can say, generally, as the gentleman knows, and knows better than I do, that so far as the enlisted personnel of European armies and navies is concerned, particularly those of France and Germany, the pay was merely nominal; it was only a few cents a day, and the pay of the officers was very low, indeed, compared with ours at the outbreak of the World War.

Mr. KAHN. I understand that in the German Navy the enlisted personnel was conscripted. They got practically nothing at all in the way of pay.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; the noncommissioned personnel of their entire military establishment was a conscripted personnel, receiving 4 or 5 cents a day, and in all those monarchical countries, and even in republican France and democratic England, the officers were, in the main, expected to have some income outside of and beyond their pay, and their army pay was small. That made, of course, and will continue to make, a very great deal of difference in the cost of the maintenance of a military establishment. It has always cost us much more per man. It costs us much more to do everything that is done in connection with our Military Establishment than it costs any other nation in the world. I am not saying that in the spirit of criticism. I am simply stating it as a fact.

Mr. PADGETT. I will ask the gentleman if it is not claimed also that it costs us more in all our industrial establishments as well as in our Military Establishment?

Mr. MONDELL. So far as wages, compensation, incomes, and rewards are concerned they always have been, and we hope they always will be, higher in America than anywhere else in the world. We are not quarreling with those facts. I am simply calling attention to them, and I am wondering whether or no this committee, with all of its earnest and faithful and patriotic labors—for they have been earnest and faithful and patriotic—have cut this bill as low as it might properly be cut. I utter no word of criticism. I had hoped, though not having as much information as the members of the committee have, that we could keep the sum total of the expenditure a little lower. Yet I realize that not a member on either side of this committee had any other thought or purpose than to keep these appropriations as low as they could be kept consistently with the maintenance of a good and efficient Navy; and we want such a Navy maintained. And if it is going to cost this much to do it, the American people will have to pay the cost.

I hope, however, that before long we may be able to reduce our naval expenditures below the sum carried in this bill, for, while we have reduced the sum $189,000,000 below the bill of the current year, we are also a year farther away from the late war, and we ought to be at least that much farther away from the excessive costs of the war.

In view of the estimates made by the department, the committee has been economical to the point of parsimony. The bill is $148,000,000 less than the amount of the original estimates of the department. It carries $222,000,000, in round figures, less than the official estimates of the department. The bill carries, in other words, two-thirds, approximately, of the sum of the final estimate of the department, of the last word the committee had from the department as to the least penny with which they believed they would be able to conduct and carry on and maintain our Naval Establishment. There can, therefore, be no proper criticism made of the action of the committee under the circumstances, and yet I know we all feel that it would be well if we could reduce these expenditures still further.

When we add to this bill the $400,000,000 and upward—I hope not very much, if any, upward—that the Military Establishment will cost, we will, as I said a few days ago, find that we are running close to the billion-dollar mark with our Military and Naval Establishments; and if then, on top of that, we yield to the demands that are made for increased pay for these services, we shall add still another hundred million to the cost of our war establishments. If we are not very careful in the coming year of grace, beginning a year and a half after the signing of the armistice and the silencing of the guns on the battle front, we shall be paying for our war establishments alone as much as we paid for all of the activities of the Government at the time we entered the European war.

It is an enormous drain upon the resources of the American people. Our expenditures ought to be sufficient to maintain a proper establishment, but the determination of the size and the character of that proper establishment should be carefully thought out, in view of the desire of the American people to maintain peace and her lack of any purpose whatever of conquest or aggression.

Then on top of this there are folks who would like to have a system under which we would spend a very large sum of money, running anywhere from $500,000,000 to $700,000,000 per annum, for military training of one sort and another.

The Secretary of the Navy advocated a largely increased program of construction. The committee very wisely declined to consider it; very wisely, first, because the expenditure of $104,000,000 in ship construction as provided for by this bill is, it seems to me, quite as much as the American people ought to be called upon to spend this year.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BAER). The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman give me just two minutes more?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes; I give the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. MONDELL. That is all that we ought to spend this year in the building of ships, the value of which as a sea defense is now very questionable. Nobody knows whether or no these great leviathans, larger and finer than any built heretofore, with guns of longer range and larger caliber than ever were mounted on ship deck, are going to be of any real value after they are built and paid for, in view of the recent developments in sea warfare. It is a question whether we shall not soon turn, as many of the great sea captains now believe we should turn, almost wholly from the building of floating fortresses at costs running from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 a year and devote our attention to the wasps of the sea, to the small surface and subsurface craft that drive these great leviathans to the harbors whenever they take to the highways of the seas. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired.

Mr. BROWNING. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, at last the War Department has furnished me with statistics showing the number of large and small guns captured from the enemy, or surrendered by the enemy, and which can be distributed through the congressional delegations to the various States and districts of the country. I shall ask leave to insert the statement in the RECORD.

I also desire to insert in the RECORD several letters which I have received from soldiers, showing that they saw Gen. Pershing during the World War at the front under fire; soldiers who saw him personally and spoke with him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. BRAND. I shall not object, Mr. Chairman, but I just wanted to ask the gentleman a question. Approximately, how many of these fieldpieces will be available to each district?

Mr. KAHN. There is a total of 2,197 trench mortars and cannon and there are 10,000 machine guns.

Mr. BLANTON. There will be a pro rata distribution, I take it, to each district?

Mr. KAHN. I hope to report out legislation allowing this material to be distributed to the various States in proportion to the number of soldiers, sailors, and marines contributed by the States for the respective services in this war.

Mr. PADGETT. I thought perhaps you would distribute them through the folding room. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS,
BUREAU OF HIGHWAYS,
City Hall, Philadelphia, October 25, 1919.

CHAIRMAN HOUSE MILITARY COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I respectfully request that this information be read at your next meeting for the benefit of Representative SHERWOOD, Democrat, Ohio, who seeks information as to when and where our commander in chief was at the front during the great conflict of the past war.

On September 27, 1918, at about 4.30 p. m., if I recall correctly, at the town known as Varrenes, where I believe one of the most stubborn resistances was met by our troops, I had the pleasure of speaking to Gen. Pershing, and I dare say from what I saw right there he displayed as much courage and set an example to all the men who were about him at that point to instill a new spirit in all these men, who were, indeed, played out by their long nights and days of constant labor establishing ammunition dumps for the Artillery and Infantry in the Argonne.

He arrived there shortly after the town was taken and while it was under heavy fire, a fire that can only be explained as a living hell. And how he got away unharmed is one of the miracles of war. He did not seek cover, but left his machine in the open road some hundred feet from the small bridge that crossed the Meuse River, and at a cross-road that was constantly under fire. He visited our Artillery—I recall it was E and F Batteries of the One hundred and eighth Artillery—while there, and I believe if his records are at hand they will verify this statement.

It seems very unjust for anyone to offer such a criticism at this stage of the game. And as I was one of his soldiers, I feel it my loyal duty to uphold his record; for, after all, the record we helped him to make, his generalship caused us to make.

And now, my good friend, I hope this will clear up this statement you have quoted as coming from the boys who did not see him.

Once more I wish to say common sense tells one it would be impossible for the general to see all of his soldiers while on the line, for there were times when we could not keep up with our Infantry, they advanced so rapidly, and our guides had more or less trouble finding their positions while delivering ammunition; so you can apply this to the general's position. If we could not see our own troops, how on earth could the commander in chief see them? Objectives were passed without a halt, and at times even company commanders could not tell where their men were in position.

If this is not sufficient for you, I can tell you of points on the Marne to the Vesle front where our general was with us and seen by many of the boys from the First, Second, Third, Fourth, Twenty-sixth, Twenty-eighth, Thirty-second, and Forty-second. I think these were the only American divisions on this front.

Hoping this is sufficient evidence to satisfy you as per your request to the House Military Committee, I beg to remain,

Yours, truly,

MICHAEL T. MCCARROLL,
Private, Company G, One hundred and third Ammunition Train, Twenty-eighth Division, United States Army.

At the time of this incident spoken of I was a runner for Col. Crane, chief ordnance officer, and directly under Gen. Liggett, commander First Army, Capt. Hall being in charge of all munitions used in this offensive. These men can also verify this statement, as we operated from their headquarters directly and supplied every division on that sector with ammunition

CINCINNATI, OHIO, November 12, 1919.

Hon. JULIUS KAHN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. KAHN: The criticism of Gen. Pershing by Mr. SHERWOOD in the House of Representatives has just come to my notice. I understand that you intend making a reply to Mr. SHERWOOD'S remarks in the House, and I desire to say to you that I have seen Gen. Pershing at the front and under fire in France.

On October 15, 1918, I found Gen. Pershing visiting the headquarters of the Fifth Division near Montfoucon. I left the division headquarters with Gen. Pershing and walked to the road several hundred yards away with him to his automobile. At that time the German shells were falling in this vicinity, especially between our position and Montfoucon. At the automobile I left Gen. Pershing, who told me that he was going to the Third Division Headquarters in the village of Montfoucon.

I told him that he should not go there at that time as the enemy was shelling Montfoucon and that it was very dangerous along the road passing through the village. He replied that he wanted to go to the Third Division and would have to take his chances with everybody else, and drove off to Montfoucon toward the area in which the enemy's shells were falling.

On another occasion in February 16, 1918, I met Gen. Pershing at headquarters of the First Division, at Misnil-la-Tour, and he informed me that he would probably be out at my headquarters next day. At that time I was colonel, Sixteenth Infantry, with headquarters at Rambouccourt.

I said to Gen. Pershing that I hoped he wouldn't come out there as the Germans frequently shelled in that vicinity and along the roads leading there and that I didn't approve of his taking such chances.

The next day he visited my headquarters and drove in his automobile along the Bouconville-Beaumont-Metz Road—the road I had spoken of the previous day.

I do not remember whether the enemy did any firing on the road or my headquarters on that occasion or not, but I give the incident to show you that Gen. Pershing was perfectly willing to take his chances.

With kindest regards, I am,

Yours, very sincerely,

J. N. HINES,
Major General, United States Army.

[Extract from the Wheatland (Wyo.) Times, Oct. 29, 1919.]

PERSHING'S NARROW ESCAPES UNDER FIRE TOLD BY SERGEANT—GENERAL'S PERSONAL CHAUFFEUR DECLARES HE SPENT MORE TIME UNDER FIRE THAN ANY OFFICER OR ENLISTED MAN OF THE AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES—ALWAYS IN ADVANCED POST DIRECTING MAJOR OPERATIONS.

NEW YORK.

Gen. John J. Pershing was the hardest working man of the American Expeditionary Force, and was under fire a greater number of hours during the war than any officer or enlisted man under his command, according to Sergt. Cesar Santini, who was the general's personal chauffeur throughout the entire length of America's participation in the war. The general worked late and was always in the advanced post command directing the movements of troops during major operations.

Gen. Pershing personally directed the St. Mihiel fight, was in the Argonne Forest commanding operations for nearly two months, and mingled with the advanced troops at Cantigny and Chateau Thierry. He questioned prisoners brought in by the doughboys at Cantigny and Chateau Thierry, and in the latter operation walked into the wheat fields to the gun positions to personally commend their crews and tell them how proud he was of them.

Sergt. Santini, who reveals these hitherto unpublished facts of the doings of Gen. Pershing in France, is a Frenchman by birth and enlisted in the United States Army as an automobile chauffeur and engineer at Governors Island on April 23, 1917. His knowledge of the French language and his ability as a chauffeur led to his selection as the commander in chief's personal chauffeur. Sergt. Santini sailed from the United States with Gen. Pershing, he drove the general over 40,000 miles of French roads during the more than two years he was in France, and he returned home aboard the transport Leviathan with the commander in chief.

Long before American troops reached the front Gen. Pershing went through the rigors and strain of intensive shell fire. In the summer of 1917 he was the guest of the French commanders and witnessed the attack on Chemin des Dames. On this occasion the commander in chief rode right up to the barbed-wire entanglements in his automobile and crossed the German trenches directly behind the lines of French infantry.

Again in the Luneville sector, where the first Americans fell in the war, Gen. Pershing went into the line. He donned hip boots and traversed several miles of trenches during an enemy bombardment. On this occasion Sergt Santini waited in a communication trench until the general returned, and admits the "Jerry" was using his high explosives to comparatively good advantage.

On another occasion, the day before the Battle of Cantigny, when the general was riding along a road toward the advanced headquarters, shrapnel shells were continually bursting directly over the automobile, steel fragments on several occasions landing on the roof of the machine. Gen. Pershing and his aid-de-camp, who were seated in the tonneau of the car, seemed to be little affected by the "strafing" they were undergoing, and no matter how near the shells landed their conversation, which probably had to do with the major operation of the morrow, was not interrupted.

During the fight in the Argonne Forest Gen. Pershing spent nearly two months in its recesses directing movements of troops. His mobile headquarters was pulled into the heart of the forest where it was camouflaged by shrubbery. Every night the general made a visit to the advanced post commands.

"The general never took any chances," the sergeant said, "he always went up to the front to be sure things were done exactly as he ordered."

Sergt. Santini was recently mustered out of service and has taken it upon himself to tell of his association overseas with Gen. Pershing.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, a few moments ago we were witnesses to another eruption from the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department in the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND], not discharged with the official sanction of the committee, not coming before the House with the approval of even a subcommittee, or with the authority of the whole committee, but delivered to the House as the act of one of the individual members of the subcommittee which has been turning its popguns, which are noisy but harmless, on the various activities of the War Department during the war.

Recently it has become increasingly apparent that there is something the matter with the Republican organization in the House and out of it. It has frequently shown symptoms of some character of constitutional or functional or systemic disorder. Exact diagnosis is difficult. There are various and differing characters of diseases to which it may be subject. There are what is called intermittent fits. The patient may have a fit to-day and then another four or five days later. The intervals between the fits are not always uniform. The attack waits seven or eight days before the victim is again convulsed by the next one, and then perhaps the sufferer may be seized by a paroxysm on the following day. There is altogether lacking any continuity or regularity of the spasms or any well-defined course of the ailment capable of analysis or precise definition.

Now, the trouble that some gentlemen on the majority side are apparently laboring under has some resemblance to that ailment. These explosions from the various committees investigating expenditures are not always timed with equal spaces between them, nor do they exhibit the same degree of virulence or the same evidence of acute mania, in each case largely depending upon the individual then under observation.

There is another disease which is distinguished by a lack of coordination of the mind and the muscles. You have seen individuals suffering from that affliction and have observed that their minds and their muscles did not properly articulate, as it were, did not act in harmony.

Mr. LAYTON. Function.

Mr. CONNALLY. In other words, their timing gear was not adjusted exactly as it should have been, and their brains and their muscles did not function simultaneously. The efforts of some of the gentlemen who are from time to time making these spasmodic and disjointed assaults bear striking resemblance to the symptoms just adverted to.

Their faculty of speech and their minds do not seem to be properly coordinated. Their physical exertions on the floor and their facts do not harmonize or correspond. The gentleman from Indiana took about 15 minutes of the time of the House, principally in letting the committee know that he had a political ache or a pain which he hoped to ease by a bitter attack on the Secretary of War, but the gentleman failed to point out any corrective. The gentleman undertook to indict the Secretary of War for spending money which had been appropriated by the Congress for the purchase of trucks and tractors. I would like to say to the gentleman from Indiana and to the leader on the majority side of this House that if the Secretary of War is to-day spending money of the United States Government for trucks or for tractors, he is doing it by the sanction of the Republican side of this House. He is doing it as an executive officer in carrying out appropriations made by the Sixty-sixth Congress, a Republican Congress.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. In just a moment.

Mr. MONDELL. No; right there. The gentleman is talking about the sanction of the Republican side. I want to know about it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall not yield until I am ready. I shall yield in a moment if the gentleman then desires me to do so. I want to say to the gentleman from Wyoming and to other gentlemen of the House that in the Sixty-fifth Congress, after the armistice was signed, as soon as it was possible to do so, the Committee on Appropriations, under the leadership of Mr. Sherley, reported to this House, and the House passed, a deficiency act curtailing war appropriations which had been made theretofore and which it was not deemed would be necessary to be expended. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming now, if he desires.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman assume to say that because Congress makes an appropriation it thereby justifies expenditures for unnecessary purposes, appropriations extravagantly expended?

Mr. CONNALLY. If a Republican Congress can not frame language in an appropriation bill specific and direct enough and hedged about with such limitations as may be necessary to prevent extravagant expenditures, it is not the fault of our side of the House nor it is the fault of the executive.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is asking of us an impossible task.

Mr. CONNALLY. A moment ago I referred to the repeal of appropriations, and I desire to reiterate that the deficiency bill of the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress approved February 25, 1919, repealed appropriations and authorizations for appropriations in the War Department as follows:

Signal Service	$128,373,200.04
Provost Marshal General	12,040,047.00
Military aeronautics	85,000,000.00
Aircraft production	402,000,000.00
Quartermaster Corps	3,756,135,307.76
Medical Department	119,145,513.73
Engineer Department	992,589,435.76
Ordnance Department	9,217,648,304.45
Chemical Warfare	333,932,610.66
Total appropriations War Department recovered	6,856,835,124.70
Total authorization repealed	8,190,029,294.70
	15,046,864,419.40

It will thus be seen that the Democratic Sixty-fifth Congress the moment it was apparent that these great appropriations were not longer needed canceled the appropriations and saved to the United States Treasury the stupendous sum of $15,046,864,419.40 in the Military Establishment alone.

The same act repealed appropriations and authorizations in the Navy Department as follows:

Aviation and aircraft patents, etc	$98,000,000.00
Bureau of Navigation	4,500,000.00
Bureau of Ordnance	195,833,843.69
Yards and Docks	2,713,627.00
Supplies and Accounts	23,096,000.00
Steam Engineering	1,420.00
Marine Corps	41,216,975.96
Total appropriations recovered	334,361,866.98
Total authorizations	31,000,000.00
Total	365,361,866.98

Prompted by the same motives of economy and retrenchment the act returned to the Treasury the sums no longer needed which had theretofore been appropriated for the Naval Establishment.

Contrast if you will this prompt, effective, and wise course of the Sixty-fifth Congress directed by the Democrats with the course of the Sixty-sixth Congress, when it appears that leading Republicans on the floor of the House charge the Secretary of War with now extravagantly and uselessly spending public moneys, when the Secretary of War could only expend such funds and such appropriations as may have been made by the majority party in the House, and on such terms and on such conditions as were made possible by the Republican majority in the present Congress.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me finish answering the gentleman from Wyoming. It is the function of a legislative body in appropriating money to make the language of the bill so plain that an executive officer has authority to expend the funds appropriated only within the limitations placed in the bill, and if the Republican side of this House is so suspicious of the Secretary of War as would be indicated by the declarations of Members on the floor of the House and from the veiled attacks and insinuations which have seeped from every committee that has been appointed by the majority side of the House, you should, gentlemen, as a precaution against the dangerous proclivities of the Secretary of War, have so fashioned your language as to make it impossible for the Secretary to spend a dollar except for the very purposes that gentlemen desire it should be expended.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman assumes that the Secretary of War will observe the law. I want to state a situation and ask the gentleman if the Secretary of War is obeying the law.

Mr. CONNALLY. Ask me a question. I do not desire to be diverted into a side discussion.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. We passed a law providing that the Secretary of War should turn over to the Department of Agriculture certain road trucks to be used in road building. The Secretary of War so construed the law as to make a truck consist of simply the wheels and the chassis, and he took off the top, the dumping apparatus, the part which made the machine usable. Does the gentleman think that was a proper interpretation of the law by the Secretary of War?

Mr. CONNALLY. In the first place, I decline to accept the construction of the gentleman from Michigan as to what the Secretary of War did.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I know only what the Chief of the Bureau of Roads told the Committee on Agriculture. That is the only authority I have.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; and when you investigate some of the reports on which some gentlemen are basing their interrogatories, you will find that Bill Jones's secretary told Sam Williams's stenographer that some third-class clerk in the War Department told his roommate that so-and-so was so-and-so. The gentleman from Michigan is willing to rise on the floor of this House and make the statement that the Secretary of War construed a certain provision in an appropriation bill in a certain way, and he makes that statement on the basis of a story told by some employee of the Agricultural Department, without calling the Secretary of War before his committee or calling upon the Secretary or Assistant Secretary of War and asking about it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That statement was made before the Committee on Agriculture by the Chief of the Bureau of Roads of the Department of Agriculture, who had himself received the trucks, and the statement was made in the presence of and approved by the Solicitor of the Department of Agriculture, who has just been named Commissioner of Internal Revenue by the President.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Did the gentleman from Michigan see the written statement of the Secretary of War about it?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. No; I did not.

Mr. CONNALLY. Was it before the committee?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I have told the gentleman the information we had.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. Give me five minutes more.

Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. CONNALLY. I repeat, that if the Secretary of War to-day is spending money extravagantly and wastefully, he is spending it because the Republican side of this House made it possible for him to do so by making useless appropriations, and the responsibility for making appropriations is on the Congress and not on the executive departments of this Government. You may smile all you please, gentlemen, but you can not disguise that the shoe is pinching, and smiles will not satisfy the American people when it comes to judgment on your foolish efforts to divert attention from your own inactivity and from your own misdeeds, from your own failure to meet the questions of legislation like statesmen, by beating tom-toms and with shoutings and hootings pointing to the Secretary of War.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. We have done everything we could to prevent extravagance on the part of the executive.

Mr. CONNALLY. I grant you have done everything "you could."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. But in spite of everything it was possible for us to do they have persisted in it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, well, if the Republican Congress is so impotent, if it is so deficient in ability, if it is so lacking in carrying out the professions that you gentlemen have made before the country that responsible gentlemen on this floor admit that the majority on that side can not control the executive departments in the expenditure of money, you are going to have a hard time convincing the country that you ought to be returned to power for another two years. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is acquainted with the provisions of the Constitution. I would like to know how under that Constitution we are going to control the executive departments?

Mr. CONNALLY. By limiting appropriations; not making them except under stipulations. Congress has unlimited control of the public purse.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know in regard to the statement of the gentleman from Michigan, but I do know that the department has furnished to the State of Kentucky 281 trucks in good condition, to be used in building roads, and they are using them there now. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the gentleman from Kentucky. It demonstrates that the Republican Members of this House, or at least some of them, are unwilling to take the pains to investigate the facts, and that the gentleman from Michigan, instead of taking hearsay testimony, should have called up the War Department and ascertained those facts.

The gentleman from Indiana stated that the Democratic side of the House had always shown a willingness to vote for investigations and later, when the committee came in with a report, they lost their interest. I want to say that the reason, if there be a reason for such a statement—and I frankly say there is no reason—the Democratic side of the House wanted a committee to really investigate something. If the Democratic side of the House in conducting the war had expended money in proportion to the expenditures by these investigating committees, instead of owing $26,000,000,000 or $27,000,000,000, we should owe $50,000,000,000.

My complaint is that these investigating committees spend their time chasing rainbows, following will-o'-the-wisps, and snipe hunting, and spend their time traveling over the country, spend their time writing reports which do not recommend any concrete or corrective action but only consist in complaints and criticisms that get nowhere. My information is that the Committee on War Expenditures, in its yearning to find somewhere, somehow, something upon which to hang a complaint or a sensational charge, has invaded the department and has employed at higher salaries accountants, clerks, and in some cases minor officials of the War Department, who, it is hoped, by reason of their service in the War Department, may have come into possession of information which may give comfort to those gentlemen who are trying to dim the splendid record of the War Department by finding a few spots here and there. Try as they may they will not be able to convince the American people that the War Department did not perform the greatest task in its history when it organized and trained and armed and fed and sent to Europe the finest and the largest army that ever went forth to battle for the Republic, an army that brought imperishable fame home from foreign lands.

Oh, gentlemen, lift your eyes from the narrow and mean page of partisanship, remember that the war was an American war, contemplate the splendid story which the success achieved in the war will permit you to hand down to your children with the proud statement that you had a part in legislating for its prosecution and its success. Look up from your Republican campaign book and behold the grandeur of the picture of America's military achievements and the proud place your country occupies as the determining factor in that struggle of the Titans.

Do not scratch the painting and tear the canvas. Let it not be said that you are now striving to minimize America's effort; do not disparage that which was so nobly wrought. Let me beseech you to keep your eyes on the splendid spectacle and quit spending your time rushing into the newspapers abusing, traducing, and denouncing the War and Navy Departments for political purposes. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, at one time and another during this Congress gentlemen on the other side have taken very remarkable positions and made various extraordinary statements in their efforts to justify the expenditures of the administration. I think, however, the statement just made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], after he had taken off the cap and bells of the jester and had gotten down to what he assumed to be real serious discussion of the matter, was the most remarkable so far made.

We all know most everybody else has been blaming Congress for everything that goes wrong under the sun, but this is the first time that a Member of Congress has claimed that Congress is responsible when an administrative officer spends money recklessly, foolishly, senselessly, and extravagantly. Of course, the appropriations carry authority to buy material and equipment and, of course, Congress must authorize the department to buy material and equipment or the services can not operate. The gentleman from Texas says that having done that, if the department was to spend all of its money for Quaker guns and toy cannon, if every warehouse of the country available to the department bulges with trucks and thousands of them are standing exposed to the elements all over the country and the War Department buys more of the same kind, it is not the fault of the official that does it, not at all, but Congress ought to have bound him hand and foot so this wasteful and unnecessary expenditure could not have been made.

I grant you that Congress ought to be careful and restrictive in its appropriations, but it is beyond finite wisdom to draft appropriations so that a man who wants to waste the public money can not do it. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. The peculiar thing about this defense of the administration is this: The other day we were discussing the saddest story of all of the sad stories of waste in the war—that of the loss of a billion dollars of the people's money without the production and dispatch to the fighting front of a single fighting airplane. The gentleman from Texas sneered at that but made no effort to defend it. Now comes the gentleman from Texas again in confession by avoidance. Not a word in defense of what was done, because there is no defense of it, but no end of abuse of the men who investigated these matters and now a most amazing effort to shift the responsibility from the men responsible for the reckless waste to the Congress, which under its oath made appropriations that the people's business might be carried on.

After all, I am somewhat inclined to agree with the gentleman from Texas that Congress is to blame when it assumes for a moment that we can safely appropriate any money for the use of the Government to be expended by the officials of this administration with the expectation that it will be wisely and judiciously expended. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the jury. [Laughter.] Well, we are always trying somebody, and I got the idea that this was a police court. [Laughter.]

By the way, not of "confession by avoidance," that new legal phrase coined a minute ago, but as preliminary, I want to say that those gentlemen who aided least in the effective prosecution of this war by this administration have been loudest in their criticism of the methods which brought success. There is a real sorrow in the hearts of many on the Republican side of the House that the war was not lost. It seems they find more satisfaction in censuring their own Government than in the magnificent victory won by our soldiers and sailors.

Nothing has met with their approval; and of those whose criticisms have been without any kind of justification, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND], I think, is entitled to lead all the rest, for a statement made by him a while ago; however, I am rather inclined to think he had some justification. He appealed to the Congress hereafter to tie a string to every appropriation.

If the country be so unwise as to elect a Republican administration, why, God bless your soul, Congress ought to take his advice. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] complained very bitterly about the Secretary of War having taken everything but the wheels off the trucks and then turned them over as trucks to the good-roads department. Neither do I censure this gentleman for being suspicious. He comes from Michigan, and they have just disclosed in a sensational trial there how an election of a Republican Senator was managed and something of its cost and corruption. A Republican jury has been compelled to convict a Republican United States Senator from that State of a conspiracy to violate the laws of this land and of purchasing a seat in the Senate. I do not blame the gentleman for being suspicious at all. In fact, if you will pardon me, I do not blame a Republican for being suspicious. In 1912, when the greatest man the Republican Party has produced could not stand it any longer and bolted the Chicago convention, where they stole him out of the nomination, he and this man named JOHNSON, who now thinks he is running for the Presidency but is not, felt compelled to issue a statement, in which they said that this Republican Party would steal the brass tablet off a coffin—and the country agreed with them. [Laughter.] Upon the evidence offered the Republican Party secured for the Republican candidate but eight electoral votes, and I understand they got them by mistake. Utah has been so anxious to correct the impression that she indorsed the Republican Party at that election that at the next election she elected not even a single Republican to any kind of office; would not even let one go to the legislature; made a clean sweep in order to rehabilitate herself before the country and regain her self-respect.

This gentleman named JOHNSON has recently issued another statement, and he is now again against the Republican Party machine. In it he refers to the "strong-armed" tactics in Minnesota and explains what he means by that. He said:

DETROIT, MICH., March 17.

The Minnesota Republican primary was characterized as "a pretense" and the "first strong-arm tactics of the 1920 campaign" by United States Senator HIRAM W. JOHNSON in a signed statement to-day.

He charged that "the Republican State machine is in absolute control" of affairs in Minnesota. "This machine," the statement declares, "has been conducting the Wood fight."

Although the State's presidential preference primary law had been repealed, Senator JOHNSON said, the Republican organization in Minnesota called what it terms a primary with a preferential vote for President. Fixing of the time of voting between 7.30 p. m. and 8.30 p. m.—

They would not let anybody vote before dark, and they counted the votes before day. [Laughter.] So that there might be no mistake, they provided that if 7.30 to 8.30 was too early—that there might still be some honest people wandering about—they gave the county chairman permission to fix the hour for holding the primary from 7 to 9—with county chairmen empowered to fix the hours 7 to 9 p. m., he alleged meant in the country districts no primary at all. "In midwinter, with the present condition of the roads," he added, "it was the disfranchisement of the farmers."

Continuing, the statement says:

"When recently I was in Minnesota I demanded a half day in which voters might express themselves. Following this, Hoover and Lowden forces made a similar demand. Of course, the machine, in absolute control and representing Wood, contemplating a mere fake primary, which might be used to influence other States, paid no attention to our demand.

"This one-hour, machine-controlled primary was a travesty on the right of free expression."

In the Republican convention just adjourned in Virginia, men—Republican men present—openly charged that you could hear the Wood money jingling in the pockets of his supporters on the floor of the convention.

You see that whenever you want to talk about the Republican Party you do not have to go over into an honest party—the Democratic Party—to call witnesses; you can get them from that party. I agree that you, a Republican, ought not to be convicted on the unsupported testimony of another Republican. But you are not. You can call one half of you against the other half any time. [Laughter.]

Now, honestly and seriously, when the Republican majority leader, who yesterday met a Waterloo and who does not yet feel well, has to take two turns at defending his party within 20 minutes, it does not seem fair that we should come along and jump on you also; but I know and you know that when you undertake to impress upon the country that the administration, the Secretary of War, is acting without warrant of law and in open disregard of law, for some motive that you do not dare express but which you hope to insinuate is dishonest, and is spending the public money wrongfully, you know that it is too cheap, that nobody believes it, and that you do not believe it yourself. You know you could not look each other in the face in a private conversation and say you had any suspicion that such a statement as that was true. There is a limit beyond which I think partisanship ought not to be carried, even by a Republican, and I admit that they are not bound by the ordinary rules of the game.

A MEMBER. You are not a partisan.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am not a partisan; I am weeping over your shortcomings. But let us get back to this same man, HIRAM JOHNSON. What is funnier still is that he and another Republican candidate for the Presidency, who was thought to be available because it was reported he had a barrel and would open it, said that there is not a chance for a man without a million in the primaries held in one of the Dakotas, I do not remember which it was. They complained that Wood's friends were corrupting the State with money. The fact is they all are being fleeced. The Republican nomination is not worth a cent after one of them shall have bought it. You are not going to get as much good out of it as Senator NEWBERRY did out of his seat in the United States Senate, which has been swept away from him by a verdict of a jury of his own peers in his own State.

A MEMBER. His peers?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; they are his peers; they belong to the same party. [Laughter.] You know that if you had taken some trouble to find out what the facts are and had come here with charges of waste or fraud and not what does appear solely as but a Republican desire to discredit a Democratic administration, the gentleman from Indiana, even, would not have had to weep at the lack of confidence displayed by Congress and the country in the reports of the so-called war expenditure committees. No one took seriously that wild tirade of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] the other day any more than they take seriously the statement the gentleman from Indiana made awhile ago that the Secretary of War was, in disregard of law, expending wastefully, wrongfully, $650,000, and not a bit more than they will take seriously the statement of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] that the Secretary of War stole the beds off the Army trucks before he let the Good Roads Department have them.

Let me tell you something in confidence: I have a 4-year-old boy, and I love him, but if he would take up with a story like that I would educate him in a school for the feeble-minded. [Laughter.] I would realize that he was hopeless. And you folks discredit yourselves when you turn in these wild statements. I will take that back, because you have not discredited yourselves. You do not discredit yourselves. You have a monopoly of that kind of statesmanship and nobody takes you seriously, and if you get any amusement out of it you should not be denied it, because, I take it, that is about the only consolation you are going to get. And it seems to me that most of you whose faces I see now I shall see no more after the next election.

Mr. MADDEN. You are going out of Congress, I understand.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman is not coming back. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARAWAY. That may be true, but whether I go or stay I shall miss you gentlemen. [Laughter.]

But honestly now—tell the truth—do you not really think you have been in control of the legislative branch of this Government long enough to do something besides wail about what has been done? Is there a single act of this Republican Congress of which any of you Republicans can stand up here now and honestly say he is proud?

A MEMBER. Oh, yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Somebody said "Oh, yes." Will he stand up and say which act it is? A witness who is not willing to stand up is not entitled to a great deal of credit in court. No one stands. There is not anything you gentlemen have done that has so thoroughly disgusted this country as to just continuously complain. We who knew your party did not expect you to do anything in a legislative way, but we did expect you to sit up and look at least—I would not say that—I started to say intelligent, but I would not do that, because that sounds too harsh, and you do that, anyway; you look it. [Laughter.]

Now, you know we have been having an exhibition of Republican patriotism and statesmanship at the other end of the Capitol. I am not allowed to say what I think about it; in fact, I could not do that, because I have quit cussing. [Laughter.] But I may be permitted to say this, that nothing you gentlemen told the country you were going to do when you were before them for an indorsement, and under which, by some kind of a mistake, the country gave you control of the legislative branch of this Government, you have performed. You have not done a thing that you said you would do.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I will yield.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman from Arkansas approve of the Democratic statesmanship yesterday in defeating the treaty and the League of Nations? [Laughter.]

Mr. CARAWAY. Do not anybody laugh. When they crucified the Lord, He said, "Forgive them, for they know not what they do." If the gentleman says the Democrats defeated the League of Nations, of course, he falls within that class.

Mr. COOPER. Is it not a fact that the administration leaders in the Senate yesterday, 23 of them, voted against the ratification of the treaty? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CARAWAY. I like the gentleman from Ohio, and I hate to say what I have to say, that the league on which the Republican Party settled its fight to regain control of this country was emasculated by the Republican Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, and no man who regarded his plighted word to this country could have voted for the treaty as they brought it before the Senate from that committee. They talked about a moral obligation that is going to rest upon some other Congress and take away from this other Congress its volition to say whether or not a condition had arisen in the world then which would justify and require the use of the armed forces of this country, and therefore they could not ratify this treaty without certain reservations. I want to say to you that whatever Congress shall succeed this, if it has no more sense of its moral obligation than this Congress has shown in dealing with the covenant and the treaty of peace, it would make no difference what you wrote into the pact, that future Congress would disregard that obligation. There is not a man on this floor who would not say that when he voted for war and these great appropriations to support it we did not say to the people of this country and to its young men we sent beyond the seas, "If you will win the victory and destroy military autocracy and save civilization, so help us, Almighty God, we will so arrange the affairs of this world that war shall be no more." [Applause on the Democratic side.] And what did the Republican Senate do? Before we brought the bodies of our dead home from France they repudiated that obligation and that solemn promise. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We know that there were not 10 per cent of the Republicans on this floor who did not believe that this treaty ought to be ratified without reservation when it was first brought here. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BEGG. Is the gentleman in favor of the original treaty?

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course, and everybody is—everybody that loves his country. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Which country? England? [Laughter.]

Mr. CARAWAY. Some people are moved by their prejudice and fail their own country for fear humanity at large may also be served and saved.

For myself and those for whom I speak we desired, and still desire, to redeem our pledge made to those who yet live and those who died.

I voted for war, not to change boundary lines in Europe nor to enrich our merchants, our manufacturers, but because I believed then and believe now that all the things for which our fathers fought and died were lost if Germany should triumph. I have stood with our soldiers in France when the battle raged and saw the fine spirit of humanity and sacrifice which animated them. I have looked down into the pallid faces when death had claimed its own. I remembered then my vows, and I remember them yet. So help me Almighty God, I meant to keep them then, I mean to keep them yet, and my party will keep them soon, if not now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. CARAWAY. I ask leave to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KENDALL].

Mr. McARTHUR. Pending that, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this bill that is under consideration—the naval bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the naval bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request, but not on the bill. I wish to extend the remarks I have just made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein certain letters received from coal producers in my district.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing certain letters referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. Reserving the right to object, how many letters are there?

Mr. KENDALL. I think there are four or five. They are very short, and they bear on the subject that I am going to discuss.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a few remarks in support of H. R. 12848, introduced by Mr. TILSON, amending the Lever Act so as to cancel the power of the President to fix prices of bituminous coal at the mines and divert the shipments thereof.

The price fixing of coal and coke and the distribution thereof during the prosecution of the war was, no doubt, a necessity. However, the Lever Act, giving that sweeping power to the President, was never intended to continue after the cessation of actual hostilities; but to-day, more than 16 months after the armistice has been signed, our great National Army disbanded, and the price restrictions on all other commodities removed, the President still continues the war restriction on bituminous coal and coke, although the act of Congress giving him that power expressly provides that such power was given during the actual prosecution of the war and not during peace times.

The prices fixed on coal at the mines by Dr. Garfield were in many cases most unjust and unfair. I have the honor to represent one of the largest bituminous coal districts in the United States. In my home county, Somerset County, Pa., Dr. Garfield fixed the price of bituminous coal at the mines at $2.95 per net ton; in Fayette County, immediately west of Somerset County, he fixed the price at $2.35 per net ton; in northern West Virginia, adjoining both Fayette and Somerset Counties, the price was fixed by Dr. Garfield at $2.50 per net ton; in western Maryland, also adjoining Fayette and Somerset Counties, the price was fixed at $2.75 per ton; and these prices are still in force to-day.

No coal operator has ever been able to understand upon what legal or just basis Dr. Garfield fixed these highly discriminatory prices for my locality. The living expenses and the value of coal lands in Fayette County are higher than in the other localities mentioned, and yet Dr. Garfield, in his wisdom, saw fit to fix the prices in Fayette County 60 cents per ton less than in Somerset County, notwithstanding the living expenses and the coal lands are much higher than in Somerset County. In northern West Virginia, where coal lands and living expenses are much lower than in Fayette County, he saw fit to pay the operators 15 cents per ton more, and in western Maryland, where the living expenses are cheaper and the cost of coal lands one-fourth of what they are in Fayette County, Pa., he fixed the prices 40 cents per ton higher than in Fayette County.

The labor conditions in all these sections are practically the same, the distribution of cars is on the same basis, the cost of production is practically the same, therefore no coal operator can fathom where Dr. Garfield obtained his figures which justified him in establishing and fixing these discriminatory prices for the operators in these four adjacent sections.

The coal operator who has a mine in Somerset County pays the same mining rate, mines identically the same vein of coal, and has the same car supply as the man who operates a mine in Fayette County, but he receives 60 cents per ton more for his coal than his neighbor in Fayette County. The same holds good between the man operating a mine in West Virginia or in western Maryland. Any intelligent man, actuated by high principles of fairness and justice to the coal operators of the country, can readily see that such a scale of prices is discriminatory and deserves the condemnation of all fair-minded people and the immediate cancellation of this unjust, unwarranted, and illegal scale of prices.

Dr. Garfield originally fixed the prices which should be paid to the operators of bituminous coal 10 cents per ton higher than the prices just mentioned, but one day, without any notice, the coal operators discovered that a reduction had been made by Dr. Garfield of 10 cents per ton an all bituminous coal. When he arrived at the prices he originally established he stated that he did so after consulting the figures prepared by the Federal Trade Commission as well as through conferences with a large number of coal producers throughout the country, and that, in his judgment, the prices arrived at were fair, just, and equitable.

Therefore, after having arrived at these prices, I fail to understand what occurred to the mind of Dr. Garfield that would warrant or justify him in making a cut of 10 cents per ton, when no other manufacturing concerns in the country had reduced their prices.

As you are aware, the railroads, the Steel Trust, the oil refineries, the munitions plants are all large consumers of coal. None of these large industries had reduced the prices of their products, so that when Dr. Garfield deliberately reached his hand into the pockets of the coal operators throughout the country and took therefrom 10 cents for every ton of coal produced and put it into the pockets of the railroads, the Steel Trust, the oil refiners, the Powder Trust, and other large corporations he committed an unwarranted act of unfairness and injustice.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENDALL. I will yield just for a question.

Mr. McKEOWN. I wanted to know if this matter had been brought to the attention of the Fuel Department at the time, and what reason was given for the difference in price?

Mr. KENDALL. It was brought to the attention of Dr. Garfield repeatedly, but he relied upon the evidence and information that he acquired from time to time.

Mr. McKEOWN. Was it the contention of the department that the coal in that county was produced cheaper than in the other counties? Is that the contention?

Mr. KENDALL. That evidently was the decision arrived at in the investigation made by the Fuel Department by Dr. Garfield, but it was absolutely incorrect, as I shall show further on.

Dr. Garfield knew that the coal operators throughout the country were intensely patriotic and would submit to and carry out all orders issued by the Government—right or wrong—and of course the railroads and other large corporations extended their heartfelt thanks to Dr. Garfield for the munificent gift handed them in reducing the price of coal, of which they were large consumers, 10 cents per ton, without even a request by them for such reduction.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. KENDALL. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Did not the railroads have contracts with the coal operators at prices much less than those fixed by the Fuel Administration?

Mr. KENDALL. I am not informed on that, but I know that there was no demand for the reduction of the price of coal of 10 cents per ton; and Dr. Garfield, when he fixed the original price, said he did so from information which he had received; and what caused him to reduce the price 10 cents per ton after he had arrived at his figures the coal operators have never been able to understand.

Mr. McKEOWN. The purpose of the Lever bill was to protect the general public in the matter of coal, and was not intended to interfere with contracts already made. I think the gentleman will find that these railroads had contracts at a very much less price.

Mr. KENDALL. The bituminous operators were recently further sandbagged by Dr. Garfield at the time that he came to Washington to settle the coal strike by granting an increase in wages to all bituminous coal miners of 14 per cent—equivalent to the cost of production of 28 cents per net ton.

Dr. Garfield congratulated himself and the country that he had settled the coal strike without placing the burden of a single cent upon the consumers of bituminous coal by compelling the coal producers to absorb the 28 cents per ton, not caring whether by so doing he would drive the operator into bankruptcy or not. During this second visit which Dr. Garfield made to the coal producers he again injected his hand into their pockets, this time taking 28 cents for every ton of coal mined, and turned this sum over to the railroads, the Steel Trust, the Powder Trust, and other large institutions, none of which had made any reduction in the price of their products, but, on the other hand, advanced their prices from 75 to 85 per cent.

So the bituminous operator today not only receives 38 cents per ton less for his coal than the price which was fixed by Dr. Garfield during the war, which at that time he stated was fair, just, and equitable, but he is also forced to pay an advance of from 75 to 85 per cent for the material he must buy for his mine, which adds another 10 to 20 cents per ton to his cost of production.

Now, when Dr. Garfield originally set the prices on bituminous coal he either made them exorbitant or the price that the operators receive to-day is entirely inadequate and unfair, and relief should be granted him from this unwarranted price-fixing oppression which ultimately means confiscation of his property.

Another most unfair order issued by Dr. Garfield permits exporters of coal to pay $1.35 per ton more than domestic consumers are permitted to pay. This order permits foreign nations to come to this country and pay $1.35 more per ton for coal than Dr. Garfield permits our own manufacturers and consumers to pay. Therefore the foreigner is made a preferential buyer and is always able to purchase coal, in many cases where it has been impossible for the American consumer and citizen to do so on account of price restrictions.

Mr. BAER. Does the gentleman know if any of the foreign countries are shipping in coal now that they had already bought from the United States at these lower prices? For instance, England is shipping in thousands of tons of sugar that she bought at the low price of 6 or 9 cents a pound; she is now shipping it in and selling it at the advanced price, and with the depreciation of the currency they are making 30 per cent additional.

Mr. KENDALL. No foreign purchaser of coal buys the coal at a less price than that fixed by Dr. Garfield.

Why Dr. Garfield should issue a preferential order, which naturally tends to take the coal out of our own country, where it is so badly needed, and supply the requirements of foreign nations, is more than the American people can understand. The shortage of coal in this country has always been largely due to the fact that many of the large producers are exporting their coal in order to secure $1.35 per ton more than they would receive if they sold it to our citizens. This order may be constitutional and legal, but as a citizen of the United States I do not hesitate to state that it is not American and should be severely denounced by all patriotic citizens having at heart the welfare and development of our Nation.

The coal committee recently appointed by the President to fix the wages of the bituminous coal miner made their report, recommending an additional advance of 11 per cent. This will add another 22 cents per ton to the production of bituminous coal. I have no doubt that under the power of the Lever Act the Fuel Administration will again see that this increase in wages to the miner will not be added to cost of coal to the consumer, but will compel the producer again to absorb the increased cost. I would not be greatly surprised if such an order were not issued.

The most pernicious, illegal, unwarranted, and discriminatory usurpation of the power of the Lever Act since the signing of the armistice has been and is to-day the diversion of coal which was bought by a consumer engaged in legitimate business activities, employing large numbers of men, who is compelled to close down his plant because the Government took his coal and gave it to some one to whom it did not belong and who was not entitled to it.

The assumption of arbitrary distribution and diversion was granted to the President whenever or wherever, in his judgment, it was necessary for the efficient prosecution of the war. No such necessity now exists. There is no prosecution of the war, and there should be no diversion of coal and no further interference with legitimate business on the part of the Government.

In this connection I desire to read a letter recently received by me, showing the hardship and great loss this pernicious system entails on innocent and helpless business enterprises. This letter is particularly pertinent as showing how long it took a concern needing coal very badly before they could get it on account of the interference by the Government in diverting the coal when it should not have been diverted.

Mr. McKEOWN. When was it diverted? Was it during the time that the strike was on?

Mr. KENDALL. No. I will read the letter. It is as follows:

Hon. S. A. KENDALL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On January 26 we had two cars of coal shipped from Sharpnack, Fayette County, Pa., to us at Grand Gorge, N. Y. On January 30 the Chesapeake & Ohio car No. 72041 was confiscated by the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. at Altoona, Pa. They notified us by letter five days later. Car No. 74865 can not be located, but owing to the time it has been shipped it is probable that it also has been confiscated.

On February 10 we wired Mr. Walls, of the United States Fuel Administration at Philadelphia, Pa., calling attention to the fact that Chesapeake & Ohio 72041 had been confiscated at Altoona, Pa., and that through their action one of our construction shafts here was filling up with water and had thrown about 100 men out of employment, and that coal had been diverted for this work during the war.

On the 11th he wired that he had turned our telegram over to A. T. Hardin, of New York City, for action. On February 14 he wired the agent at Shandaken, N. Y., to have us fill out an application, which we did on the same date. As we understood the matter, coal would be furnished us. Up to noon of the 18th none has been delivered.

Their action in seizing the coal has cost us to date about $5,000. The shaft is filling up with water, the great majority of the men are leaving for other employment, and the men that we induced to stay we are compelled to pay their board until the coal arrives. This is only a partial list of our losses.

We will consider it a favor if you will take it up with the Fuel Administration there and see if he can not have the regional director at New York place three cars of coal at Grand Gorge, so that we can unwater the shaft and prevent any further expenses accruing.

As our general offices are at Connellsville, Pa., in your district, we thought it best that you handle the matter before the proper authorities for us.

Yours, very truly,

G. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary S. J. Harry Co.,
General Contractors, Shandaken, N. Y.

Former President Taft, in speaking on this subject, says:

Arbitrary powers conferred upon the Executive, which are in their essence legislative powers only permissible in time of war to meet an emergency, should not be continued beyond the period reasonably calling for their use, and it is the business of the courts, when cases of this kind are properly called to their attention, to see to it that in the time of actual peace those powers are ended and the individuals are protected from their oppressive exercise. It is easy for executive officers and heads of bureaus to grow accustomed to such arbitrary power and to assume that no emergency can be met except by an extension of those powers after the war.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be allowed to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CRAGO. That has already been granted.

Mr. BROWNING. I did not know that.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, I will here insert the other letters that I referred to.

The following communications received from large coal operators will show the sentiment regarding the enforcement of this provision of the Lever Act, and the demand for its prompt repeal:

H. H. LINEAWEAVER & CO. (INC.),
Philadelphia, March 17, 1920.

Hon. S. A. KENDALL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We appeal to you for your influence for the repeal of the Lever Act. As we understand, it was a war measure only. The coal industry, in our judgment, can not function properly as long as the Government control continues or is possible. This must be plain to you from the fact that when the Fuel Administrator, Dr. Harry A. Garfield, relinquished his position some time ago it was admission on his part that the control of coal was no longer necessary, and there is now no head to the Fuel Administration, and no one to appeal to. We further believe that any law, such as the Lever Act, which suspends the Constitution of the United States, is illegal.

The new year in the coal industry begins with April 1, and we think it is asking too much that any industry which has given so much as the coal industry has, during the war period, should be compelled to enter this new year with Government control still effective, and prompt action with relation to this matter is respectfully requested.

Yours, truly,

H. H. LINEAWEAVER, President.

Hon. S. A. KENDALL, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KENDALL: Will you please permit me to call your attention to the present continuation and enforcement of the Lever Act in the fuel industry and also the irreparable injury it is doing to all concerned—the mine owner, the miner, the consumer, the railroads, and the public? The industry itself is being strangled to death; the miner is forced into idleness; factories are compelled to shut down or run on short time; the railroads are losing millions in freight rates; production, the very thing that is needed to bring down the cost of living, is being curtailed instead of increased, due to the lack of fuel, and the higher costs are passed on and saddled onto the public. If this act was doing anyone any good anywhere, it might be cited as a justification, but there is none. Instead the far-reaching effect of its evil influence is beyond estimation. Home trade is ruined, our export trade is lost, and billions of dollars' damage is being done to the Nation's one prime industry.

The unwise schemes employed to handle the fuel situation during the coal strike resulted disastrously, to say the least. They confiscated, diverted, and held loaded coal cars for from 60 to 90 days, until at the end they had over 253,000 loads on the track. Many of these are still standing. This has resulted in the greatest car famine that any industry has ever witnessed.

We do protest, and earnestly protest, the continuation and enforcement of this drastic war measure in time of peace, and the more solemnly do we protest it when it is doing evil instead of good.

We ask your careful consideration of this matter and hope that you will do everything in your power to secure its repeal. We are,

Very respectfully,

JENNINGS COAL & COKE CO.

BROTHERS VALLEY COAL CO.,
New York, N. Y., March 9, 1920.

Hon. S. A. KENDALL, M. C.,
Twenty-third Congressional District Pennsylvania,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The war has ended, and the emergency legislation growing out of the war also should end.

Our citizens have submitted patriotically to the regulations of the Fuel Administration and lately to the central coal committee, which is a branch of the Railroad Administration.

Government control of the railroads is a demonstrated failure, and with equal certainty Government control of coal is a demonstrated failure. It is the direct cause of the present shortage and congestion in the handling and transport of coal. There is plenty of coal-mining facilities and labor, but the administrative red tape now in vogue will not let the coal reach the consumer.

The business of the coal trade is to supply the country adequately with coal. If left to itself, the coal trade will do this, as it did before the war.

We favor a discontinuance of governmental control of fuel and hope you can consistently use your influence to repeal the Lever law.

Yours, very truly,

D. V. REYNOLDS, Treasurer.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., March 12, 1920.

Subject: Bituminous coal.

Hon. SAMUEL A. KENDALL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I would be pleased to have you vote for the repeal of the Lever fuel control act as early as possible. This act has caused a great loss to Pennsylvania coal operators and is a nuisance, as it interferes with the regular channels of business, especially for the smaller operators throughout Pennsylvania.

Thanking you in advance for your kind attention to this matter, I am,

Yours, truly,

FRANK B. JONES.

UNIONTOWN, PA., March 11, 1920.

Hon. SAMUEL A. KENDALL, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. KENDALL: I presume you are being besieged by coal and coke operators in your district in regard to the Government regulations of prices, and it is very hard for a red-blooded American to sit quietly under the unjust treatment that is being handed out to this district.

As we understand it, our products—coal and coke—are the only products in which the Government has ruled on a fixed price, making that price the same as had been established during the war period. If the Government was fair and just in the action it took in regulating prices during the war, when it fixed prices on most all commodities, it certainly is inconsistent now, when it has removed price restriction on all other commodities, except our own, and further ordered an advance of 14 per cent to be paid all labor.

The price of basic pig iron was fixed at $33 in 1918, to-day it is $41.50, and the advance in price not only in iron and steel products but of all supplies that go into mine operations has advanced from 10 to 60 per cent over war prices, and we are asked by the Government to absorb all these advance costs without being allowed to advance the selling price of our commodities.

If that is fair, our earlier education of the justice on which our Government is conducted was not correct. There is some consolation to us, however, in the belief that the Supreme Court of the United States has the correct conception of American ideals and justice.

We recognize in this district that the beehive coke industry is doomed, and that it will be only a few years before by-product coke will take its place, and from a position of economics and conservation we accept the situation as a natural outcome.

As you know, a very large amount of money is invested in western Pennsylvania in these oven operations, and a part of it must be charged off when the ovens are put out of commission. There is bound to be a loss at that time, but we can not understand why we should pile up that loss by Government discrimination as at present.

The by-product coke industry does not need the help of the Government in establishing that industry, and yet it is doing it directly or indirectly.

I inclose a clipping taken from the Connellsville Courier of March 11, in which it states that by-product coke is being shipped into our competing territory at a price of $12.55 per ton, f. o. b. ovens. Can you explain to me why I, as an operator, could not receive the same price for a like commodity? Government price, $6.

Yours, truly,

TOWER HILL CONNELLSVILLE COKE CO.,

NEW ENGLAND COKE IN EASTERN PENNSYLVANIA.

Considerable New England by-product coke is being sold in the Philadelphia district for prompt and near-by shipment at $12.55, ovens, at Everett, Mass. Most interesting sale is one of 7,500 tons of this fuel at this price for shipment in April to an eastern Pennsylvania blast furnace, which needs this fuel to maintain operations. PERMITS FOR COAL SHIPMENTS.

THE WHOLESALE COAL TRADE ASSOCIACION OF NEW YORK (INC.),
January 31, 1920.

Hon. SAMUEL A. KENDALL,
The Highlands, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The inclosed preamble and resolution adopted at the annual meeting of this association, held January 20, 1920, is respectfully referred to you with the request that you give the matter such direction as may lie in your power to bring about a discontinuance of the practice.

Yours, respectfully, CHAS. S. ALLEN, Secretary.

Whereas it is the sentiment of the coal trade as represented by those assembled here that the requirement of obtaining permits from the carriers for the shipment of coal to tidewater points is altogether unnecessary, and works a great hardship upon the trade, in that delay incident to obtaining such permits frequently results in failure of consummation of a transaction in coal tonnage between the wholesaler and the operator, and especially in view of the shortage of coal at tidewater points: Be it therefore

Resolved, That the members of this association, for themselves and on behalf of the coal trade generally, enter a vigorous protest against the continuance of the permit system governing the shipment of bituminous coal to tidewater ports because of the absence of necessity for the same and the many inconveniences attending the carrying out of the plan and the futility of the plan when carried out.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, I shall speak on the naval appropriation bill. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. It will be the first speech that has been made on that bill to-day.

Mr. PELL. It would be absurd to build a Navy merely to provide floating flagpoles to carry the Stars and Stripes into foreign harbors and to show it to strange peoples. The Navy is built to fight, and although we are, I am happy to say, to-day at peace with all of the strong naval powers of the world, we must realize that it is possible that this condition may change. If it were not for this possibility, there would obviously be no need of a Navy at all.

A substantial increase in the Naval Establishment is an almost impossible achievement while war is going on unless the Navy is, as was that of England's in the Great War, clearly stronger at the beginning than that of our adversary. We have learned nothing from the history of the last four years more clearly than that the second best navy is as worthless as no navy at all. From August, 1914, until October, 1918, we saw what was very definitely the second strongest navy of the world kept practically within a hundred miles of its base and unable to inflict any serious injury on its opponent. Except for the submarines, the German Navy was, because of its cost of construction and maintenance, actually a detriment to the Central Powers.

The organization of merchants dealing abroad, backed by the foreign office of their own Government, to develop new markets for the products of the home country, which is the modern condition of foreign trade, dates only from about 20 or 30 years ago. During all of this time the great rivals of the world were Germany and England, England trying to retain what she had and to seize more, Germany to seize and to retain. Our Navy never arose to greater than a very poor second to England, and during the administrations of Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Taft was passed by Germany, but at that time our relative naval strength was amply sufficient. At no time during the last 20 years would it have been possible for England to detach from home waters a fleet sufficiently large to engage that of the United States without having the Germans attacking their rear. If, on the other hand, the Germans had attempted to fight the United States, the last German transport would scarcely have been through the Channel before the English would have attacked them. We are now, however, in a very different position. It is inconceivable that the English will ever allow any nation of continental Europe to begin the construction of a fleet which can seriously threaten the naval supremacy of Great Britain. So that, as far as Europe is concerned, if we except England, we need hardly build at all, but against England we will have no possible makeweight. For more than a generation the English will have no fear of a fleet attacking them from the east.

International sympathies and international friendships change almost with every generation. I am one of the youngest Members of this House, and yet I recollect very well in my boyhood that when you spoke of an Anglo-Saxon you meant not a citizen of the modern English-speaking nations, but a Danish pirate of the Dark Ages. It was the proudest boast of the Englishman that he belonged to the great Teutonic race and was the hereditary enemy of the Latin. This has changed in our day.

I am very glad to see that it is the policy of this Congress to expand our foreign trade and our foreign relations. We will invade the great markets of South America and of Asia, which for four years have been undersupplied.

This will mean trade rivalry; this will mean contention, and I feel that we should be ready to support our citizens abroad effectively. I sincerely trust that we will have difficulty in the future with no one, that we will be able peaceably to settle all controversies with the great nations of the world, but it has been my observation that when you get in a partnership with another man in which one side has to trust the other, you can not be worse off and you may be much better off if it is the other man who does the trusting. The same rule will apply to nations.

If we continue to build at the rate that we were building during the war, in the course of four years we will probably double our Navy. A further doubling can not take place for six years more because of the difficulty of training officers and men in such numbers. By that time, however, we will have clearly passed England and have the dominant navy of the world, and having taken the control of the sea we will be able to keep it for generation after generation. If, however, we delay and give to the English a breathing time in which to recover, they will be able to build ship for ship and keep for themselves the maritime control of the earth for an indefinite period.

We saw yesterday that the treaty-making power of this country has decided that the United States shall go it alone. It is none of our business to criticize them, to say that they were right or that they were wrong, but we must recognize the fact that this country intends obviously to stand on its own bottom, and not to rely on the support or friendship of other countries, but to stand for and by itself. It is not a disgraceful idea. I personally would have preferred to make another choice, but they did not. It is evident that this will be the policy of our country from now on. There is no use talking of anything else. And if we are going to rely upon strength, let us be the strongest. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE].

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this being rather a field day for general discussion, and having consulted none of my colleagues on the committee, I want to make a few brief, calm observations to the House on the subject of longer continuing the Committee on Claims, unless that committee is going to receive some recognition and have its day in court.

I have been a member of the Committee on Claims for nearly a year. There are hundreds of meritorious claims reported out of that committee. Of course, there are hundreds of claims referred to the committee that are not meritorious, but I am glad to say that under the able chairmanship of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] those unmeritorious claims are put aside, and my judgment is that 99 per cent of the claims reported out of that committee are the claims of private individuals who have just grievances against their Government and whose claims ought of right to be adjudicated by the American Congress. [Applause.] No court would be permitted to continue that would so trifle with the rights of litigants and the rights of claimants as this Congress trifles with the rights of claimants against this Government. I am not seeking to put any blame in any one place. I am merely calling the attention of the Congress to the fact that one thing or the other ought to be done. Either the opportunity should be presented, so that these parties may have their day in court, or this committee ought to be abolished. I have never known a finer membership than the men with whom I have associated in the Committee on Claims. Week after week, after labor and study and investigation and the hearing of witnesses, they report their findings to the full committee and the full committee reports the bills to the calendar. But the "tomb of the Capulets" is not more silent nor is it a place of more everlasting sleep than the sleep which engulfs the reports of the Committee on Claims in this House.

I call your attention to the existing situation, and, if possible, call the attention of the country to the fact that the members of the Committee on Claims and the members of the House themselves are not responsible to the people all over this land who are awaiting the determination of their just and equitable claims against the Government of the United States; but the fault lies in the suppression not only of private-claims day but in the suppression of days allotted to the Committee on Claims. It is not a question of economy. Every man wants reasonable economy, but a Congress that appropriates $65,000,000 to add to the pension roll of this country 55 years after the Civil War certainly ought not to disturb itself over the question of allowing the presentation to this Congress and an adjudication of the rights and claims of children, of women, of poor men all over this land. Let me say that if I have any criticism to make of our Government it is in the neglect which that Government shows of the rights of the individual citizens of this land, submerging the rights of the individual as against the claims of large interests.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN].

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, in the Sixty-fifth Congress I introduced a bill, which I have reintroduced in this Congress. That bill has brought down on me some criticism, and I have also received considerable favorable comment upon it. The purpose of the bill is this: Under the old rule the Congress saw fit to drive away that pernicious thing that menaced the liberties of this country and menaced good government—the lobby. You drove it out from the Capitol, and rightfully so. Now, I have introduced a bill that I think will reach another lobby. The present manner of trying to influence legislation is to go to work and collect funds from all over the United States from interests that are specially concerned in legislation and seek to create public sentiment by propaganda, and thus seek to influence congressional action by that propaganda. This bill will not hurt any organization that has an honest purpose. But I say that whenever in this country those who represent certain special interests go to work and under the guise of some patriotic organization or name they institute propaganda to influence the country in order to put through some particular scheme, the Congress ought to know who it is that is putting up the sinews of war and who is behind the movement. This bill provides that all such associations, corporations, or persons who collect money for the purpose of influencing national legislation shall make reports to the Secretary of Commerce. Those reports ought to be made to the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate, so that the membership of Congress may be informed as to what is going on in the matter of propaganda. When a measure is introduced in this House and in the Senate we receive many communications, and an investigation would show that the letters were written at the solicitation of some special interest that was behind it. Gentlemen, if we had had such a law as this it would not have been necessary to investigate the Security League, because the Congressmen would have known who it was that was behind the movement. It is the modern method of influencing legislation, and there ought not to be any objection by an honest association to putting on record the names of the persons from whom funds are solicited and secured to carry on the propaganda to influence legislation.

I want to say to you now that the time will come, whether it comes very soon or not, when the Congress of the United States will undertake to protect itself against associations of special interests that try to influence legislation in Congress by this medium.

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I will.

Mr. BAER. Has the gentleman ever inquired into the practice of some departments in using the money that we appropriate for them for this propaganda?

Mr. McKEOWN. I have not made any special investigation, but if such a practice is carried on it is a practice that I do not think there is a man on either side of the House that would be in favor of permitting such conduct on the part of any department. No department should be permitted to waste tax money by taking money appropriated for it to influence Congress for any special legislation for the benefit of persons in the department.

Here is what I have in mind. These people go to work, get an office, and adopt a high-sounding name, and then go out to people who are interested in the legislation and solicit large sums of money to conduct the campaign. It is promoted under the guise of being for the benefit of and for the uplift of the Nation, but is really for some special thing that will eventually be turned to the interest of the men who pay the money. I can not see why there should be any objection to requiring every organization or every person who solicits funds for the purpose of carrying on a campaign to enact certain Federal laws to putting themselves on record so that we can see who put up the money, who spends the money, and so that we can see whether it is really coming from the people. There is nothing in it to suppress free speech or the freedom of the press, and no man would be more against a proposition of that kind than would I, because I believe that the American people ought to have the right to petition Congress, to express to Congress their will, what they want, without fear and without any restriction. But I do not believe that a few men have a right in order to influence congressional action to go to work and collect money from special interests throughout the country to carry on a propaganda, and then go under the guise of public sentiment that they have tried to create. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KRAUS].

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am constrained to take this limited time, because I find that I am not in accord with the majority of the membership of my committee, the Committee on Naval Affairs, in some of the essential features involved in this bill. In doing so I am glad to say that I believe that every one of my colleagues are animated by a desire to have a Navy efficient and effective, and all that is necessary for the defense of the country, and to acquire it with the least unnecessary expenditure of money. I believe my colleagues on the committee will do me the credit to concede that in my attitude before the committee on the matters which I will refer to I have been animated by precisely the same purposes and motives.

In order to call your attention to a few phases of the bill I am going to give you comparative figures, and I am taking the date of June 30, 1916, the end of the fiscal year just prior to the beginning of the war, and comparing the situation as of the date of December 31, 1919, dates at which figures can be most readily obtained.

I suggest that in considering these figures we should keep in mind that the Secretary of the Navy has repeatedly said that when the war began the Navy was ready. That was a statement in which every American took infinite pride. The weakness, if I may call it a weakness, of the Navy as now organized and operated is that an abnormally large shore establishment of the Navy is now maintained, an establishment which necessarily grew up during the war when we were prepared to care, so far as the shore establishment is concerned, for a Navy with a personnel of 500,000 men.

So that you may have before you the figures in this matter—and I know that figures are uninteresting—but I submit, gentlemen, that they teach a lesson which should urge us to economy in certain parts of this bill.

The total number of officers in the Navy in 1916 was 4,243. The number on the date that I have mentioned, December, 1919, was 11,099. Enlisted men on June 30, 1916, numbered 54,234. Enlisted men December, 1919, 103,000 in round numbers, or somewhat less than twice the number of enlisted men in 1916.

I call attention to this, gentlemen, because the bill carries appropriations for an unnecessarily large number of officers and enlisted men if the men are properly used, if they are placed in the correct service of the several branches of the Navy. The number of officers in 1916 engaged in shore service—and my figures, unless otherwise stated, will refer solely to shore service—were 1,222. In other words, 28.8 per cent of all the officers of the Navy on June 30, 1916, were engaged in shore duty.

Now, what are the figures for 1919? The number of officers at that time on shore duty and shore service was 4,626, or 41.7 per cent, as compared with 28.8 per cent in 1916. An increase of almost 13 per cent, and a total number in shore service almost 400 in excess of the total commissioned personnel of the Navy on June 30, 1916.

I desire to call attention to the enlisted personnel in the shore service. In 1916 there were 12,344 men, or 22.8 per cent, and in 1919 there were 36,731, or three times as many, or a percentage of the total enlisted strength equal to 35.4 per cent, an increase of 12.6 per cent. But that does not end the shore service in so far as the personnel is concerned, and in giving these figures I am excluding the Navy Department at Washington. These figures refer only to other shore activities. The classified service in 1916 carried in the shore service 3,009 individuals, or a number equal to 5.6 per cent of the total enlisted strength of the Navy. It is unnecessary to state, naturally, that the classified individuals are not members of the naval force, but the number relative to the actual enlisted strength equaled 5.6 per cent. In 1919, at the date mentioned, this number had grown to 15,776, and in giving you the corresponding percentage you will find that that is equal to 15.2 per cent of the total enlisted strength of the Navy.

There is another branch of the service in which the personnel has grown abnormally, disproportionately to the total enlisted strength of the Navy, and that is the unclassified service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. KRAUS. Will the gentleman from New Jersey yield me 10 minutes more?

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes also.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. KRAUS. The unclassified service in 1916 had in it 31,934 men, a number equal to 58.9 per cent of the enlisted strength of the Navy. The unclassified force in 1919 numbered 80,355 men, or 77.4 per cent, an increase of slightly less than 19 per cent.

To me these figures are not only startling but they are appalling. It convinces me of a lack of coordination, and I am saying this not for the purpose of criticizing, but to call your attention to it with the hope that by a lessening of the appropriations we will necessarily secure the employment of a much smaller number of people in these various classes. In other words, the Navy was efficient at the time we entered the war. The men to-day can be and should be in the service of the Government just as efficient, and no one can suggest a reason why there should be this disproportionate increase in the number of men in the various services.

I could convert these percentages into actual figures, and for the purpose of emphasizing and illustrating the situation I am doing so in one instance. The number of civilians and enlisted men in the Navy on shore duty per officer in 1916 equaled 38.7 men and the number of civilians and enlisted men on shore duty per officer in 1919 equaled 28.7 men. In other words, there was a reduction of 10 noncommissioned men for each officer that there was in the Navy.

I have called attention to this one phase of the matter, and I now wish to call your attention to the law and the situation under which we are now working. In the early days of the war the temporary strength of the Navy was increased from practically 57,000 to 87,000. Keep in mind that that was a temporary increase. Substantially one year later, when we were still at war—and I think no gentleman will contend that serious consideration was given at that time to the elements in determining what number should constitute the permanent Navy—we increased the permanent enlisted strength of the Navy to approximately 143,000 men. That is the authorized number under which we are operating now, and frankly I say to you that the appropriations have not in fact been made by this committee on that basis but on an assumption that there would be on an average of 120,000 enlisted men in the Navy. The appropriations are made on that basis. I submit that if anyone will examine the hearings he will find no justification for authorizing an enlisted strength at the permanent figure at which it is now fixed, and the time to correct this, in view of the fact that no legislation has been presented to you, and you can not assume that legislation of this kind will reach this floor, is at this time through these appropriations. The necessity for this number of men is built up by following a vicious circle, and I do not say that unkindly. Keep in mind that the first-line ships of the Navy—the backbone of the Navy—have not materially increased in number since 1916. We have a horde of other vessels which were built for temporary, unusual, and limited purposes, and which we should have the courage to discard, because they are serving no useful purpose in the Navy. The vicious circle is pursued in this way: The Bureau of Operations recommends that there be kept upon the first-class battleships and certain other ships a much larger number of men than any nation has heretofore used in peace times—much larger than the number we found necessary in our history in the past or than any other naval nation has had. The department will then seek appropriations on a basis assigning excessive personnel to the ships. As a result, we find that that policy would put approximately 90,000 men on ships in peace times, an entirely unnecessary number, a number equal to almost twice the number of enlisted men in a navy of but little actual strength of the Navy in 1916. In other words, if in 1916 the Navy was prepared, if we then had the nucleus, if we had the officers and men, it can not be successfully demonstrated that we should keep this abnormally large number of men in the service at this time. The result of this present large permanent strength is that under the law we keep in the service an unnecessarily large number of officers, because the law fixes the number of officers, and as a result you practically keep every man in his present advanced commissioned grade, which he received as a result of war necessity, with the additional pay and allowances that go with that advance.

I have made these few general statements with the purpose later on of submitting for your consideration at several points in the bill an opportunity to bring the appropriation down to a point which I believe is fully sufficient to care for the defense of the country and keep our Navy in the state of preparedness it should be, without unduly burdening the taxpayers of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes out of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING] for his use. I yield also seven minutes now to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW].

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, it had not been in my thought to speak in the general debate on this bill, and I suppose I would not have done so at all had it not been for the things that have been said to-day about extravagance during the war. Now, I think I have a good many witnesses to the fact that I have never made a narrow partisan speech on the floor of this House. If I keep my present feeling, I think I never shall; that is, a strictly partisan speech. But the thing I am moved to say right now, I think, is suggestive of a wholesome contemplation from the standpoint of Americanism, for I believe in that kind of true, all-embracing Americanism beneath whose rising tide petty partisanship ought always to be swept away. [Applause.]

I never shall forget what my good, genial friend, my colleague from Michigan, PAT KELLEY, said some time ago, when we were having a discussion, and I said, "Look in the white of my eye. Do you believe there is a single man on the floor of this House or over yonder in the Senate who does not, way down deep in his heart, believe that whatever the mistakes of the President, he has tried to do his honest, tireless best for the safety of America and the peace of the world?" Must I tell them what you said? [Looking at Mr. KELLEY.] Well, he smiled and made the answer that I wanted him to make.

This is the thing I want to emphasize. Whatever the mistakes of the President—and he is human—I believe that every man believes that he has done his best, his honest, tireless best for this country and humanity. And he fell on the firing line of a great patriotic purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UPSHAW. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is liable to get his colleague defeated if he does not look out.

Mr. UPSHAW. Then I know that he is such a golden-hearted fellow that if we have got to have a Republican from his district—and I have been up there and know how he is honored—they could not do better than to send honest, brave PAT KELLEY. [Applause.] But, frankly, I think that the President and some of his loyal supporters made a mistake on yesterday, a very great mistake, for, if I had been voting—I was so anxious to see some sort of a covenant of nations adopted that would safeguard America, of course, and also make some effort to guard the peace of humanity, that if I had been a Member of the Senate I would have voted for the ratification of the treaty with its reservations, believing, as I believed on the railroad bill, that I did not wholly indorse, that it was the best thing in sight [applause]; that a company of nations who enter into an agreement to try to keep out of a fight are apt to come nearer keeping out than if they enter into no agreement at all and keep on enlarging armies and navies in order to be ready for a fight. [Applause.]

I think that on that issue I stand somewhat with Dr. James Gordon, the brilliant Washington preacher, who said, "I am a Republican, and I want a Republican league. If I can not get that, I want a Bull Moose league; and if I can not get that, I want a Democratic league; but I want some sort of a league, and I want it quick." And if we can not have an international covenant born of Democratic vision, like Wilson dreamed and LODGE and Roosevelt championed three years ago, then let us have something, and have it now, that will help to force a cruel nation that has proven that it had no more respect for a sacred contract than to call it only "a scrap of paper"—force it, I say, to stand by the pledge that it signed on "the dotted line."

Mr. FOCHT. How would they arrive at a conclusion, when one country would have six votes and another country would have one?

Mr. UPSHAW. I want to emphasize now—and I think my genial colleague from Pennsylvania must recognize it—that his question does not enter into the things that I am now discussing.

Mr. FOCHT. Oh, yes; I think it does.

Mr. UPSHAW. For if I had been in the Senate yesterday I would have voted with those who sought to guard against that supposed inequality, for the country is weary of waiting; they want some sort of a settlement of the question, and they want it now. America is suffering at home from unstable conditions, while the play of partisan politics in the Senate for more than a year since the armistice was signed is grievously hurting our prestige abroad. And whatever may be said about the supreme need of humanity, our commerce at home, and especially abroad, is burning, if you please, while the Senate "fiddles" away.

SAVING MEN INSTEAD OF MONEY.

But this is the thing I rose especially to say: I traveled on a train with a major from New York—New York, mind you—who had under his care the building of 19 cantonments during the war. I had just been elected to Congress, and the conversation turned to the press and partisan talk about extravagance. He said to me, "Congressman, we were told to be quick about it; that we had no time to lose. We were told not to see how much money we could save, but how many men we could save by speedy preparation."

I want to remind both sides of the House that if the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy had been slow, if they had waited days and weeks and months for sealed bids, if you please, competitive bids, when the world was in danger, there would have been a mighty protest, a righteous protest, from every true patriot in America.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BROWNING. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. UPSHAW. This is the thing I want to emphasize, gentlemen: I believe it will make us better Americans if we will never allow a partisan spirit to make us criticize the administration during the time of war. Somebody had to lead—some administration had to be in power. In the Spanish-American War it was a Republican administration, and in the great World War it was a Democratic administration, with the danger and the demand far greater than ever before. Of course, I would not stand for any kind of postwar extravagance, but the war-time extravagance that grew naturally out of the vast volume of money that had to be voted for speedy action, I think no man should now stop or stoop to criticize, for that water has already passed under the bridge. We were called on, not to see how much money we could save, but to see how quickly we could be sure of saving that flag yonder that inspires us every day—our beautiful flag that Democrats and Republicans together voted money to protect and arms to save. [Applause.] It is no time when a man's house is on fire to call up neighboring towns over the telephone and see which fire company will save his home at the cheapest rate. It is a matter of salvation now; and I think we would all be happier Americans if we would catch that vision that would give us a glorious national pride in the struggle through which we have passed and the victory we have won. Let us thank the god of battles—the god of nations—for our national and international salvation and quit "fussing" about the cost. When I hear a man, in face of our great victory, talking and fussing about "extravagance," I think that if that man were eating a fish and were to come to a bone in it, he would throw the fish out of the window and keep gnawing the bone. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAER. Do you think it is wise to buy a million sets of harness for 340,000 horses in time of war or in time of peace or at any other time?

Mr. UPSHAW. Perhaps not. I am not denying the fact that we made some mistakes.

Mr. BLANTON. They needed some harness for some Congressmen.

Mr. UPSHAW. Yes; and it were far better that a lavish patriotism should spend too much for harness in trying to lay up an ample supply for perhaps several years of war than that we should be harnessed forever to the chariot wheels of German autocracy for lack of speedy preparation. When a man talks about extravagance during the war, I want to say—I was not in Congress at the time, but I want to say I remember the newspaper stories of how my Republican friends vied with the Democrats in showing that they wanted to stand for greater appropriations than were absolutely necessary. Fifty years of a lack of national preparedness—most of these years, remember, under Republican administration; and I speak this not in condemnation, but as the simple recital of history—had left our defenses in such a condition that those who found the conduct of the greatest war in all history suddenly thrust upon them were compelled to compass heaven and earth and hell to rush men and munitions to the battle front for the safety of America and the rescue of freedom.

A WONDERFUL NATIONAL ACHIEVEMENT.

And think of the wonderful achievement! Two millions of men in a land of peace, marshaled, munitioned, and trained, and sent 3,000 miles away, within 18 months, with two millions more ready to follow, and six millions more ready to follow them if America's rapid, resolute, and resourceful action had not caused the Huns to throw up their hands so soon—that—that was America's mighty task and our unparalleled achievement! That was the vision of defense and victory that inspired Congress and every working department. There was no criticism then. It was patriotic to vote and spend and fight together then. In other words, were the glories all American, but only the mistakes Democratic? That is the narrow partisan view. Over against this political charge of extravagance let us drown out the din and the jargon of folly by shouting, "Hooray for the American flag!" [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UPSHAW. Excuse me, but I want to finish.

Mr. KNUTSON. Very well, I do not want to interrupt the gentleman's peroration.

Mr. UPSHAW. I think it is a fine thing to just think about our common glory under the new meaning of the "Stars and Stripes." When narrow partisanship dips its tongue into gall and its pen into the frenzy of petty political pillage, let us answer again, "Hurrah for the Stars and Stripes! Hurrah for the soldiers and sailors who upheld the flag we love! Hurrah for the American people who stood back of the soldiers who upheld the flag we love! Hurrah for the President of the United States who represented the people who stood back of the hero soldiers, sailors, and marines who fought for the flag we love! Hurrah for America! E pluribus unum sic semper paregoric nux vomica est! Hurrah for the Stars and Stripes!" That is our answer——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UPSHAW. Hooray for the Fourth of July! [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the opponents of the railway bill, after being given a fair hearing and being beaten by a decisive majority, were not content to accept the result, but have used every effort to induce the President to veto the measure. Having failed in this they have entered upon a campaign of misrepresentation as to the purpose and effect of the bill. Part of this misrepresentation is through a misunderstanding of its provisions, part through ignorance, part for political purposes, and part sheer demagoguery. Statements have been made and reiterated and are being constantly circulated which are so utterly at variance with provisions of the bill that at the time of the submission of the conferees' report upon it it was considered only necessary to make brief reference to it or in some instances to ignore them entirely. Yet, Mr. Chairman, the propaganda that is being carried on, if left unanswered, must have its effect, and I feel called upon even at this late day to make some remarks upon the bill which did not seem to be necessary at the time of its final presentation to the House.

Mr. Chairman, for years I have voted, along with Senator CUMMINS and others who have been influential in the passage of this bill, against unreasonable rates on railroads and against the payment of dividends upon watered stock and fictitious issues of bonds. I stand, and Senator CUMMINS stands, where we always have stood, but it has been a matter of surprise to find so many gentlemen who have never heretofore been interested in this subject now claiming that this bill gives unreasonable privileges to the railroads. Along with these gentlemen are many honest and well-meaning people who have been deceived by the continual cry that the bill gives unwarranted privileges to the railroads and imposes an unjustifiable charge upon the people of the United States. Besides these the labor organizations, which the bill very fully protects, have also been misled as to what is contained in the bill and have been determined to continue their opposition even after the passage of the bill.

I have no desire to discuss the bill at length. Its provisions in general were so admirably set forth in the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] that I only intend to refer to some provisions of it which have been much perverted and evidently much misunderstood.

It is continually asserted that the bill contains a guaranty of returns to the railroads. As a matter of fact, its provisions really constitute a limitation upon the profit that may be obtained and no guaranty whatever, as I shall undertake to demonstrate without fear of successful contradiction. The only guaranty in the bill is a guaranty of the same return as is now allowed under Government control, which return is to be the same for the first six months under private ownership.

Mr. RAMSEYER. If the Government had held the railroads under the act that we passed in March, 1918, this guaranty would have continued as long as the Government held the roads, would it not?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Certainly; it would have continued as long as the Government held the roads or until a different law was passed. We were asked by some to hold them two years longer.

Mr. RAMSEYER. While now it is only for six months?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; that is all. It is for a much shorter period than if the bill had not been passed.

I shall not discuss this guaranty which was contained in the original bill under which the Government took over the roads. It seems to have been approved by practically everyone, yet such is the inconsistency of the opponents of the bill that they overlook the fact that this guaranteed return received under Government control gave the railroads a larger net profit than they can obtain under this bill after the first six months. I have not time to review the figures showing this, but no one who is acquainted with them will dispute this statement.

I wish to discuss more particularly the rate-making provision of the bill, which is erroneously claimed to contain a guaranty and by some is said to make a gift of immense sums to the railroads.

Let us first consider what this provision is, taking neither my own statements nor those who oppose the bill, but the language just as we find it in the measure itself.

Paragraph 2 of section 15 (a) of section 422 of the bill reads as follows:

In the exercise of its power to prescribe just and reasonable rates the commission shall initiate, modify, establish, or adjust such rates so that carriers as a whole (or as a whole in each of such rate groups or territories as the commission may from time to time designate) will, under honest, efficient, and economical management and reasonable expenditures for maintenance of way, structures, and equipment, earn an aggregate annual net railway operating income equal, as nearly as may be, to a fair return upon the aggregate value of the railway property of such carriers held for and used in the service of transportation.

This is merely a concise statement of the law as it now stands, inserted, I assume, only for the purpose of making connection with subsequent paragraphs to the bill and framing the bill so as to have a complete rule of rate making comprised within its provisions. It is an elementary principle of constitutional law that whenever the control or regulation of private property is taken over by the Government a fair return must be awarded to the owner. Years ago the Supreme Court of the United States, in Smith v. Ames (169 U. S., 466), held in a railroad rate case as follows:

> What the company is entitled to ask is a fair return upon the value of that which it employs for the public convenience.

This has been the settled rule ever since that decision was made and it has been and would be followed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, whether included in the bill or not.

Mr. BAER. The bill now gives them a fair dividend on their actual valuation, which has not been determined yet.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Not a fair dividend, but a fair return on their actual value which is a very different thing. There may be, and in many cases will be, no dividends to the stockholders. The bill, in fact, fixes the rate as low as it is possible under the Constitution, and not partially or wholly confiscate the property.

I can well understand how the farmer or the layman, who is not familiar with constitutional law and the distinctions made under it, should at first blush not understand why the Government, which makes no provision for a "fair return" on other property, should so provide in the case of railroad property; but a moment's reflection will enable anyone to realize that there is a wide difference in this respect between property over which the Government exercises no control, and as to which it does not limit the profit; and property which has been taken over or placed under the control of the Government so that the profit thereon is limited. It is the settled law under our Constitution that where the Government fixes or regulates the return which may be received from private property a "fair return" must be provided. That a rule so well established that it is now in a legal sense elementary should be overlooked by one who has not come in contact with it is not at all surprising, but I am amazed that any complaint should be made with reference to it by persons who have had some reputation as attorneys or even one who has succeeded in passing the ordinary bar examination. If this provision was not contained in the bill its effect would be just the same. If the provision were different, it would make the bill unconstitutional in this respect. [Applause.] Yet there are men who say that this provision authorizes a gift of immense sums to the railroads.

Mr. COOPER. In reference to the value of the property, does not the bill specifically state that it is that property which is used for transportation purposes?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; only property that is used for transportation purposes, as is shown by the portion of the bill which I read, and then only when it is efficiently and honestly managed.

Passing now to the next paragraph of the bill we find that this "fair return" for the next two years is fixed at 5½ per cent on the value of the property used in transportation. There is, however, no guaranty that this return will be made nor is there any obligation on the part of the Government to make good any deficit. It is merely the rate level which shall be established "as nearly as may be" on the value of the railroad property in groups as established by the commission. Nor has it any relation to stocks and bonds. Under it some roads may not be able to pay even the interest on their bonds because the actual value of their property may not be as much as their bonds and nothing can be paid on watered stock.

While complaint has been made that 5½ per cent is too high a rate, consideration of present financial conditions will show that this complaint is not well founded. The rate must be such that the railroads can obtain money for the equipment that will enable them to render good service. When Government bonds upon which there is no State or local taxation and only a portion of the Federal income-tax rates when held in excess of certain amounts can be bought at a rate that will pay 5½ per cent, while railroad bonds that are a first lien on the railroad property for less than half and in many cases less than one-quarter what it cost to reproduce it before the war, to say nothing of present prices, can be bought at rates that will pay from 7 to 12 per cent, it is idle to talk about the railways being able to obtain money at less than 5½ per cent, and the real question is whether they can get it at that. The other day I noticed a list of about 20 of such bonds published in a separate paragraph following the market reports in a reliable paper. It is probable that the present rates are abnormal, but no one expects them to improve in less than two years, and at the end of that time a readjustment can be made.

A great outcry has been made that the last-named provision of the bill was in the interest of Wall Street and the great banking houses, yet if this is so it is strange, indeed, that from day to day during the consideration of the bill, after it was agreed upon, and even since it passage, railroad bonds and securities have steadily declined so as to reach, in the case of most of them, the lowest point ever known. It is evident that the business world takes no stock in any such statement, which, in the face of the market quotations, becomes simply absurd. Moreover, it is well known that the great financiers have been proceeding to unload their railroad stocks for a long time and that they are still continuing to do so. The bulk of these stocks and bonds is now held by the big insurance companies, savings banks, and thousands upon thousands of small holders, who have seen the value of them depreciate in tremendous sums in the last few years, while stocks and bonds of ordinary business corporations have greatly appreciated in value. The reasons for this great decline in railroad securities are not difficult to find. Under the rates now fixed by the Government while under Federal control, some of the railroads actually failed to make operating expenses during the year 1919, and a large number failed to make operating expenses during last December. A considerable number failed to pay operating expenses and fixed charges—that is, taxes and interest on bonds—during 1919. The railroads of the country failed to earn the return guaranteed by the Government in 1920 by a total sum of about $390,000,000, and the total loss to the Government during its two years' operations will be over a billion dollars when all bills are settled. While rates have been increased, the cost of wages and material have increased so much more rapidly that the financial condition of the roads has steadily become worse.

It must be perfectly evident to anyone who has given the subject the slightest consideration that railroad rates will have to be advanced whether the Government retains control of the railroads or whether they go back to private hands unless the American people wish to pay the loss in taxes, as they are now paying it. I am opposed to paying the loss in taxes.

I know of no reason why I or anyone else should be taxed because some one wants to ship canteloupes from Arizona at a low rate, pay a low freight on articles of luxury, or go on vacation and pleasure trips at low rates. The true rule is that the user should pay the freight. Some wild statements have been floating around as to what would be the effect of a raise in freight rates, and some gentlemen of this House have quoted with approval a statement to the effect that an advance in freight rates would cost the American people five times the amount of the increase. Yet these very same gentlemen voted for a Government tax in the form of a heavy increase in the rates, and neither they nor anyone else have ever been able to discover any place where this increase of rates appreciably affected the cost of living. If they believe any such statement as this, it is little to their credit as legislators that they should have cast their vote for a tax that they knew would cost the American people five times the amount which the Government received from the tax. The real fact is that experience has shown that there is not the slightest basis for any such claim.

But it is also said that the cost to the people under private control and the rate provisions of the bill will be more under private operation than it has been under Government control and operation. Possibly this might be true if the Government had nothing to pay but the guaranteed return, but the Government, in addition to the guaranteed return in money, was obliged by its contract to return the railroads in as good condition in respect to its property as they were when taken over. Of course, when the railroads made, as a few railroads did, something over the guaranteed return, the Government could pay the maintenance charges out of this surplus, but when they failed to make the guaranteed return there was nothing out of which these payments could be made. This explains why the total loss to the Government is much larger than the deficit on the guaranteed return, and when we consider the sums which the Government has already paid and the further fact that by reason of its failure to keep up and maintain the railroad property as agreed it is liable for very much larger sums, it becomes perfectly evident that the cost to the people under private control will not be as great as it has been under governmental management, and we hope and believe that the service will be greatly improved.

In this connection I can say that in a considerable degree the failure in respect to service has been caused by the Government failing to keep up the railroad property. The purpose manifestly was to try and make as good a financial showing under Government management as possible, but the effect was disastrous in many ways. For example, the Government purchased only a very small portion of the number of new freight cars which are usually bought every year and which become absolutely necessary as the old ones are worn out. The failure to furnish cars, which all through the Middle West cost the farmer such large sums, was due principally to the failure of the Government in this respect, but nothing will be saved by it even to the Government, because under its contract it must still make up the deficiency. It is claimed by railroad managers that the railroads need the enormous sum of $6,000,000,000 to put the roads in condition to render proper service to the public. I think this amount is greatly exaggerated, but that at least a billion dollars is required I think no one who has made a study of the question will dispute. The American people want service, and good service, because nothing is so costly as bad service. To prevent the great loss resulting when farmers can not move their stock or their grain or manufacturers their products the railroads must be put in condition to render proper service, and the provisions of this bill will do no more than to enable them to get the funds which are necessary for that purpose, and it is certainly to be hoped that the bill will do no less.

The most singular thing of all is that anyone should have received the impression that the bill makes any provision for dividends on stocks and bonds or gives value to watered stock. The amount of stocks and bonds issued under the bill has nothing whatever to do with the fixing of rates. There is not a line or a word in it that can possibly be twisted into such a meaning. In fact, the only reference to stocks and bonds found in the bill is contained in those sections which provide that no more capital stock or bonds or other evidences of indebtedness of the railroads shall be issued until after investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission and a finding that such issue is proper and necessary. This will protect the public against the issue of worthless securities and prevent the railways being burdened by improper indebtedness in the future.

In addition to the objections that have been made for the purpose of appealing to the farmer, the laborer, and the shipper, the bill has been strenuously objected to by those in control of the rich and prosperous roads for the reason that it limits their profits and provides for a division with the Government when they exceed 6 per cent, one-half of the excess going to the Government to be used to improve the equipment and service of roads that have been less successful. The owners of these roads would have much preferred that the Government should pay for them and take them over rather than to have this bill passed. While it is natural that they should object to their profits being decreased, it is absolutely necessary that something should be done for the benefit of the weaker roads, and the plan has been worked out with great care and skill. There are certain roads that can not get traffic enough to enable them to buy the equipment and keep up their tracks so as to render good service to the public, and there are lines of considerable length that have been in danger of being junked for that reason. Yet these lines are essential to the existence of the communities through which they pass, and there is no one who does not wish to see them operated. If the rate was raised on these roads alone by themselves, it would drive business away and render their condition worse than before. If a rate was established for all of the roads that would make these roads pay, there are some of the big systems that would make unreasonable and even extortionate profits. For this reason the rates are to be established in groups, and the provision is made for the benefit of the weaker roads, as I have before stated. Two objections are made to this; one that it is unconstitutional, and, while this objection is supported by some lawyers of high standing, the great weight of authority is that it is within the authority of the Government under its general power to regulate the rates. The other objection is that it puts a premium on inefficiency. This assumes that a railroad does not pay because its management is inefficient, but he who thinks this the only cause would expect the owner of a farm with poor soil to make as much as one that had more fertile land. Railroad management has now become standardized and under the close supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission over their accounts it is practically impossible to embezzle their funds. If a railroad runs over the line of a great commercial highway, has the shortest distance and the lowest grades between two or more great commercial centers, it will be profitable with reasonable rates, while another road that goes a roundabout way with heavy grades, lacks sufficient terminals, and connects no important commercial centers, can barely earn, or sometimes does not even earn, operating expenses. Yet the management of the latter may be, and often is, more economical than that of the former. The difference in location has more effect than the difference in management.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Have not a number of these railroads indicated now that they are not going to accept this provision, and they do that on the ground that they will make more money? Why were they not able to make more money before?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not understand my friend's question. I do not consider that it is the privilege of the railroads to accept this provision or reject it.

Mr. McKEOWN. I understand that the Southern Railway has decided not to accept the provision to make only 5½ per cent and turn over the remainder to other smaller railroads, because by not accepting it they will be able to make 6 per cent or more.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is one of the best provisions in the bill. The Southern Railway will find that out. It gives authority to limit the profits a railroad can make.

Mr. McKEOWN. I want to know whether the other railroads will make enough money for the small lines to get something out of it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The weaker lines will be aided, unquestionably, in the way I have stated.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is not one of the provisions which the railroads must accept. There is another provision of the bill as to which they must signify their acceptance.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If there is any claim of that kind, it must be on the ground that Congress has no right under the Constitution to take away any of the earnings of the highly prosperous roads, but this provision is merely a limitation on the earnings. Congress has as much right to do this as it has to limit the rates. It is conceded Congress may limit the rates and charges, and this would limit the earnings. I think the provision is clearly constitutional.

I do not care to discuss the provisions with reference to labor disputes. This bill creates a board, upon which the public is represented, to which an appeal can be taken when the employers and employees can not settle their differences. The decision of this board is to be final. This is right. Disputes as to wages should be settled finally by a tribunal upon which there would be some one who would take into consideration the interests and rights of the public, because the interest of the public is as large as that of any group or class, if not larger. There should be such a tribunal corresponding to our Supreme Court for the determination of such disputes to which appeals can be taken. Our whole court system under our Federal and State Constitutions proceeds on this plan. If it is wrong, then our Constitution and laws are wrong and he who objects is not willing to conform thereto.

Another provision gives the Interstate Commerce Commission the control over the issues of stocks and bonds and the authority to determine not only whether they shall be issued but where the proceeds shall be applied. It not only permits but encourages consolidations where they are in the interests of the public and at the same time guards the public welfare in every respect.

The bill is a great constructive measure, admirably written, studied out with the most painstaking care, and if properly supported by employers and employees will go far to solve problems that have hitherto been thought to be too difficult for solution, and gives to the people of this country the benefits of private initiative and action, free from the evil practices that have been connected with the management of some roads in the past.

Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING] five additional minutes.

Mr. BROWNING. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, political platforms many times have been considered as a means by which a candidate or a political party could win an election. Political platforms in the past have dealt with generalities, and the more ambiguous and obscure they were the better they answered the purpose intended. In the coming presidential campaign the people are going to insist upon specific declarations by all political parties and all candidates for office and also a faithful performance by the successful party of its platform pledges.

There are two sets of candidates running as delegates to the Republican national convention from Wisconsin. I desire to read a brief statement of principles upon which the set of delegates designated as "the La Follette Republicanism ticket" stand:

PLATFORM OF PROGRESSIVE REPUBLICANS.

1. We favor the immediate conclusion of peace and resumption of trade with all countries.

2. We are opposed to the League of Nations as a standing menace to peace, and we denounce the treaty as a violation of the pledges made to the world and a betrayal of the honor of this Nation. It would make us a party to the enslavement of Egypt and India, the rape of China, and the ruthless oppression of Ireland.

3. We would favor a league for peace, composed of all the nations of the world, provided they were mutually pledged by binding covenants, with proper guaranties, to abolish compulsory military service, and, provided further, that the several nations mutually bind themselves to a speedy disarmament, reducing the land and naval forces of each nation to the strict requirements of a purely police and patrol service.

4. We demand the immediate restoration of free speech, free press, peaceable assembly, and all civil rights and liberties guaranteed by the Constitution.

5. We favor the repeal of the espionage and sedition act, and denounce the attempt to write such laws into the permanent statutes of the country.

6. We oppose all legislation conferring upon the Postmaster General, or any other governmental agency, the power to deny the mailing privilege to any person, without judicial hearing and the right of appeal.

7. We oppose compulsory military service in time of peace. We denounce the use of our soldiers in countries with which we are not at war, and we favor the speedy reduction of world armaments.

8. We oppose the exile of any person lawfully admitted to this country, except for crime fixed by law, and then only upon trial and conviction by jury.

9. We demand the abolition of injunctions in labor disputes.

10. We favor laws permitting labor and farm organizations for the purpose of collective bargaining in industry, trade, and commerce.

11. We favor such legislation as may be needful and helpful in promoting direct cooperation and eliminating waste, speculation, and excessive profits between producer and consumer as offering some measure of relief from the oppressive and intolerable economic conditions under which the farmer, the wage earner, and people generally suffer at this time.

12. We favor repeal of the Esch-Cummins railroad law by which the people are forced to guarantee railroad profits, while such railroads are privately owned, and declare for the ultimate public ownership of railroads, and the gradual acquisition of stockyard terminals, large packing plants, and all other monopolies and natural resources, the private ownership of which is the basis of private monopoly.

13. We demand economy in government to replace the extravagance run riot under the present administration. The expenses of the present year of peace, it has been estimated, will be approximately $11,476,627,929, or ten times the annual prewar expense.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE. I have only two minutes left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that even where a Member has time it is improper to read documents where objection is made, especially where they are political platforms.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BROWNE. I will continue the reading:

14. We condemn the system that permits 18,000 millionaires to be produced from war profits—one millionaire for every three American soldiers killed in France. We demand that taxes be laid upon wealth in proportion to ability to pay, in such manner as will prevent such tax burdens being shifted to the backs of the poor in higher prices and increased cost of living.

15. We denounce the alarming usurpation of legislative power by the Federal courts as subversive of democracy, and we favor such amendments to the Constitution and thereupon the enactment of such statutes as may be necessary to provide for the election of all Federal judges for fixed terms, not exceeding 10 years, by direct vote of the people.

16. We favor such amendments to the Constitution and thereupon the enactment of such statutes as may be necessary to extend the initiative and the referendum to national legislation and the recall to Representatives in Congress and United States Senators.

17. We favor paying the soldiers of the late war a sufficient sum to make their war wages equal to at least civilian pay, and this as a matter of right and not as charity or bonus. We favor other laws liberally recognizing the patriotic devotion of our soldiers in all our wars.

18. We favor a deep waterway from the Great Lakes to the sea. The Government should, in conjunction with Canada, take immediate action to give the Northwestern States an outlet to the ocean for cargoes without change in bulk, thus making the primary markets on the Great Lakes equal to those of New York.

19. We favor a platform for the Republican Party embracing these principles and a candidate for President whose public record is a guaranty that he is in full accord therewith.

We pledge the people that, if elected as delegates to the Republican national convention, we will use our best efforts to promote these principles and nominate candidates in sympathy with them.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, Hon. Frederick Edward White, a Member of this House in the Fifty-second Congress from the sixth congressional district of Iowa, died recently at his home in Sigourney, Iowa. Under the circumstances it is proper that I say a few words at this time concerning the career of this remarkable man.

Mr. White was born in Prussia, Germany, in 1844. At the age of 10 his father died while in the service of the Prussian Army. At the age of 13, young White came to this country, detesting kaiserism and militarism. He settled in Keokuk County, Iowa, and worked around as a farm hand until the outbreak of the Civil War. As soon as he became 18 years of age he joined the colors and served in the Union Army with honor, bravery, and distinction for three and one-half years as a private in Company I, Thirteenth Iowa Infantry. He participated in many of the principal battles, and was with Sherman on his famous march to the sea. By his Army service he gained his American citizenship—an achievement of which he was very proud.

After the Civil War he married and settled on a farm near Webster, Iowa, where he lived and toiled for 45 years. He had no schooling, except such as the country school afforded before the Civil War. By toil he amassed a comfortable competence. By study he became one of the best informed men of his time. He was a man of deep convictions and unflinching courage. He became a master of the English language, and was one of the most forceful public speakers of his State.

In politics he was a Democrat. While in Congress he delivered several notable speeches. Two of his speeches—to wit, on the tariff and on disarmament—received wide circulation, and were translated into a number of foreign languages. His speech on the tariff was for years used by the Democrats as a campaign document. After his service in Congress he was three times the Democratic candidate for governor of Iowa.

When the World War broke out Mr. White at once took an open and public stand against the cause and methods of Germany, and in most vigorous language denounced the autocracy of his former fatherland. After Congress declared war against the Imperial German Government, he was very much in demand for public addresses. It was during the first year of the war, while delivering an address for the Red Cross, that he was stricken with apoplexy, from which, after a protracted illness, he died. He lived, however, to see the Prussian autocratic military power, which he abhorred, crushed into the dust.

Mr. White was a man of most sterling character, probity, and earnest devotion to duty. He died having the respect of his friends and all who knew him. His youth was filled with hardships and privations, and his manhood with worthy achievements. In the death of Mr. White there has passed from the activities of this life a Union soldier, a sincere friend of the people, and a patriot.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED].

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have asked this time to read, with the consent of the committee, extracts from a letter which I have received from a petty officer of the Navy whom I have known for years very well. It sets forth so well the need of increased pay not only from the standpoint of the needs of the individual but also from the standpoint of the need for national defense that I think it should be set forth in the RECORD.

Compare the case of labor with that of the service man, and let us see how he fared. His pay was increased but so very slightly in comparison with that of labor and the increase in the cost of living that the wonder of it is that he managed to get by at all. He is now living (?) on a wage which he received in 1908, except for the temporary and very nominal increase, which is apt to be taken away from him at any time.

One naturally asks the question, What manner of men are we supposed to be, and what is expected of us?

We can not live on air. Parades in our honor provide entertainment for the public only, for they mean nothing to the participants. We are lauded in speeches, but does that put food in our mouths or clothes on our backs and our families? Does a service star on a flag or a name on a roll of honor help us when our clothes are too shabby to attend a gathering of our fellows? Men who left the service for civil life are astonished at the salaries that their training enables them to command. They tell us of how well they are doing, and do you suppose for one instant that it makes us who are forced to remain in service any more contented with our lot?

In reckoning the strength of the Navy it has been the custom to figure on the basis of possession of so many superdreadnoughts, so many dreadnoughts and predreadnoughts, and so on. Each ship has such an such an armament and engines of a certain horsepower. Tabulated, it does not look so bad, for the Navy never had so many units numerically as it has to-day. It is a fleet "on paper" in reality, or it might as well be, for the units which are able to put to sea are just about as effective as the U. S. S. Recruit, now in Union Square in New York. The rest of the fleet is tied up at docks in navy yards, with but a handful of men on board, and unable to move at all.

On January 8 of this year it was announced that the Atlantic Fleet went south to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for winter maneuvers. But a small portion actually went, and it limped all the way down. The maneuvers are now consisting of small-arm target practice at the rifle range, an exercise which develops the sailor but little in his work of firing 12 and 14 inch guns of the ship's battery. There are no engineering exercises at all, for the reason that a ship has not on board sufficient men in the engineering department to drive a ship more than 12 or 15 knots. There is little or no gunnery exercise. If a ship goes out to target practice, she borrows a force of engineers and as many gun crews as she needs to man her battery and engineer department fully from some other vessel, and fires her practice. This procedure does not tend to any degree of development. The scheme is not satisfactory, but it is the best that can be followed in view of the shortage of personnel. Therefore, even though you have hundreds of ships, unless they are properly manned the fleet is worthless. Money already spent is wasted and it would be the height of folly to spend any more. How absurd is it to add more ships to the Navy if you can not man what you already have? And yet that is just what is being done.

Even now the Bureau of Navigation of the Navy Department is collecting a draft of 800 men to go to Germany and bring back four or five German war ships which have been turned over to us by the Allies for our share of the "spoils." Of what earthly use will these German ships be? All the ships she had which were worth anything were sunk at Scapa Flow, and these are rotting hulks which surely must require hundreds of thousands of dollars to make habitable and millions if to be made serviceable with our reserve fleet—that is, to be safely tied up to a dock without danger of sinking.

If, then, you expect us to man the ships provided, the personnel must be provided for. The numerical strength actually is provided for, but the actual number of officers and men in service falls far below. To do this an attractive pay schedule must be devised and the money raised and appropriated. Thousands of men are willing to return if they are adequately paid. If the United States really wants a Navy, this money will be raised; but if, now that the immediate menace is over, they refuse to profit by lessons learned during the war, and think that they no longer require protection at sea, why not come right out and order the fleet wholly tied up and the crews disbanded and discharged? When the next war comes—which, please God, it never may—we will be in the same situation we were in this one as regards naval defense, but with by no means the certainty that we will have an ally who can stand the enemy off while we build up a fighting force worthy of the name. But what of that? Are we not safe for the present? It is for Congress to decide, and it is hoped that the decision will be prompt, for the business of serving in the Navy under present conditions is disheartening and burdensome.

I wish to ask your indulgence to the extent of placing my personal situation before you. While it is not typical of the enlisted men as a whole it is in part. I first enlisted in 1910 at the age of 18, and have served continuously ever since, being now on my third enlistment. You can readily see that most of my training has been along lines of service calculated to do the most good in the Navy. I am a chief yeoman, and it took me seven years of hard, conscientious application to clerical work to obtain that rating. I feel that I have made good in the Navy for my proficiency marks are high, and I take a pride in doing my work as well as I am able. I like naval service, though it has its drawbacks, and the Navy accepts me generally as being an efficient chief petty officer; at least, so many officers under whom I have served have been good enough to say. I am married and have two children. To adequately provide for them I have been forced to contract a large debt in purchasing a home for them. Landlords objected to my children, and my rent was raised so high that I was forced to raise money with which to buy my own place where I could take them without fear of further molestation. To meet overhead charges I had to use all reserve funds in the bank, and these have been gone for some time. I next called upon my mother for assistance, which she gladly gave and is giving. Without her I can not keep my head above water. But this can not go on. I am a man capable of earning my own living without assistance, but here in the Navy, unless something is done to raise my pay, it is impossible, and through no fault of my own. I am thinking seriously of leaving the Navy, though how to leave honorably I can not see at present, but I hesitate to take the final step, not because of fear or apprehension that I will not make good in civil life, but because the necessity for relief of men in the service is so apparent and just that it seems hardly possible that Congress will close its eyes and ears to our needs.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. SINCLAIR].

Mr. SINCLAIR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I rise to speak a word for my constituents, who are as underpaid as any in the land.

I wish to call attention to the bill introduced in this House by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. RIDDICK], which is reported and on the calendar, H. R. 11312, to appropriate money for the relief of the drought-stricken farmers of that State. I also introduced a similar bill, H. R. 11852, looking to the providing of the same relief for the farmers of North Dakota.

I want to say that, while we are practicing economy, it is not good business to practice economy in the line of that which will reduce production. The farmers of North Dakota are in need of aid to buy seed and feed with which to increase their production, and we ought to do something in the matter of extending to them that aid, because the farmers of the country are the ones upon whom the prosperity of the Nation depends.

The Agricultural report shows that at least 10,000,000 farmers have left their farms in the last decade because they have been unable to make ends meet. It is plain that we ought to do something to retain the present number of people on the farms.

The Great War took thousands of young men from the farms and they have not, in the main, returned to take up their former avocation. These boys constituted the help upon which the small-grain farmers depended in the production of their crops. A great shortage of farm help already exists, and has resulted in a much-reduced crop acreage throughout the winter rye and wheat districts. This reduction in planting amounts to about 30 per cent below the average. It is very evident that if a sufficient crop is to be produced this year with which to feed a hungry world, there must be a very large increase in the spring planting. This means that all the lands formerly seeded to spring wheat must be so planted this year. From my own knowledge, this can not be done in the drought-stricken areas of the Northwest unless aid can be given the farmers. Many of them, as a result of three successive failures, dut to unprecedented drought and rust, during which time the resources of the counties have been strained to the limit in extending aid, now find themselves in a position where they have not the seed for planting nor the money or credit with which to buy it. The banks of the affected areas have done all that could be expected of them, and in many instances more, in helping their customers. They are now without sufficient funds to grant the credit necessary for the financing of another crop. I have scores of letters from bankers in my district stating that they would gladly loan money to their farmer patrons to meet this emergency if they had it on hand. They know it is a good business risk, but the money is not to be had.

Could not at least a small part of the vast funds of the Federal Government now in the congested money centers be deflected to the banking institutions of the stricken areas to be in turn loaned by them to those in need? My bill, H. R. 11852, providing for the deposit of $10,000,000 by the Federal Government in the Bank of North Dakota, would meet the situation, so far as my State is concerned. Similar action could be taken in other States. There is ample precedent for such a course. In the spring of 1918, the Secretary of the Treasury advised the chairman of the Federal reserve bank of Dallas, Tex., to the effect that if he found that banks in the drought-stricken area were insufficiently supplied with loanable funds, deposits would be made in national bank depositaries in drought-stricken districts up to an aggregate of $5,000,000. This was done, and the entire fund was allotted among 88 national banks in amounts varying in accordance with the applications and the needs of the several districts. Of course the argument might be made that this was done in time of war. But the emergency existing then in Texas was no greater than that which our farmers in the Northwest are facing to-day. And it is a fact that when the Government called upon the farmers all over the United States to speed up production, those of the Northwest responded just as heartily and as patriotically as any other section of the Union. In this connection I think it would not be amiss to say that North Dakota, with a population of less than 700,000, lost in soldiers actually killed 4,266, while New York, with a population of nearly 10,000,000, had killed only 9,136 during the Great War. I do not wish to convey the thought that New York did not do her share in the conduct of the war or that she should have lost more men, for I know that she came to the front as valiantly as did any State, but I do say, and most emphatically, that it is little less than a national disaster that the great majority of the boys lost from the North Dakota ranks came from our farms, making more acute the farm-help problem in my State.

A few days ago this House of Congress voted to give aid to starving Europe to the extent of 5,000,000 barrels of whole wheat flour, which represented the profit of the United States Grain Corporation. Upon reflection, every Member of this body will realize that this profit came entirely from the grain producers of the country. It was fitting and proper that we should give aid to suffering Europe, but in our zeal to help those abroad we should not overlook the call for help from those at home, whose efforts made this bounteous gift possible.

They do not ask for charity but simply for a loan that will enable them to plant their crops and tide them over until a harvest can be had. This will insure the planting of many millions of acres in badly needed wheat and will save thousands of farmers from the loss of their farms and the work of a lifetime. They have every reason to believe that despite the hard luck of the past three years there will be a good harvest this season. In years past my district, which is a part of the country affected by drought, produced over 40,000,000 bushels of wheat and rye and 35,000,000 bushels of oats and barley in a single year, besides almost half the flax of the United States, so that there is no doubt but that, granted favorable weather conditions, a crop can be had. In fact, the present serious condition has been unprecedented in the history of that region. The weather outlook now is for a good crop this year, as there has been more winter moisture than in years.

It is no doubt difficult for those not familiar with conditions to believe that many of the farmers and their families actually are in want for proper food and clothing; that stock is being fed upon Russian thistles, and often can not get upon its feet without aid; that many of the men have had to seek work away from their homes to survive the winter—and that is not always to be had—that the counties are nearly all bonded to their limit, and therefore are helpless to come to the rescue in furnishing seed and feed, but all of these conditions exist, as is shown by the report of the Red Cross, who have been doing relief work, and who recently appropriated $50,000 to care for the most urgent cases. I quote from their statement as follows:

Money or credit is needed immediately so that stock can be put in shape for the spring work, so that seed may be distributed. Such money or credit should be granted on such liberal basis that those who have exhausted commercial credit may be able to obtain benefit. It is impossible to estimate definitely the amount of funds needed but $5,000,000 would be ample for all cases of urgent necessity.

The $10,000,000 provided for in my bill means only 44 cents per acre for the drought area, but it will take care of those who have reached the final limit of their resources and to whom no other course is now left than abandoning their farms unless aid is forthcoming, and that at once. Federal aid now will do much to encourage the sturdy pioneers who have reduced the barren prairies to cultivated fields and maintain their faith in the beneficence of their National Government.

Mr. BROWNING. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, our very cordial and much respected colleague from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] made some rather striking observations, I thought, in regard to the vote that was taken on the treaty yesterday. He suggested that no one who regarded his plighted faith could have supported the treaty as it came from the Committee on Foreign Relations. I have looked over the vote of day before yesterday on the reservations. The yeas were 54, divided, 40 Republicans and 14 Democrats. The nays were 26, all Democrats. If you notice the division of the vote, it will be 40 Republicans and 40 Democrats. Fifty four-eighths, or, to be a little more practical and not quite so exact, five-eighths of the vote were for the final reservation No. 2, on article 10, the one the President stated would cut the heart out of the league. One-third of that aggregate were Democrats. Less than three-eighths voted against the reservations. In other words, less than three-eighths of the Senate agreed with the President, while five-eighths refused to accept his decision, one-third of which were Democrats.

I think my friend Mr. CARAWAY should revise his observations when he realizes that one-third of the vote belonged to his own party.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. If one-third of our party goes wrong, does the gentleman think that that justifies his entire party being wrong?

Mr. FESS. It will take more apologies of my friend to apologize for one-third of his party than it will to apologize for our whole party.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the gentleman think that much more is expected of our party?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I think the public will demand more. Now, I do not want to be unfriendly, but I must not yield any further.

Mr. CARAWAY. I would not, either.

Mr. FESS. I do not mean to. The vote for ratification shows that of the 84 votes cast 49 of those were for ratification with the reservations and 35 were against ratification. Of the 49 for it, 28 were Republicans and 21 were Democrats. Of the 35 negative votes, 12 were Republicans and 23 were Democrats. The striking fact is that the Democratic vote was 21 for and 23 against, which comes very nearly being as many Democrats for the ratification with the Lodge reservations as there were against the ratification. This indicates both the strength of the position of the Senate and the weakness of that of President Wilson. Had he acceded to the Americanized league instead of holding to the Wilson view, there would have been very few votes cast against the treaty as safeguarded by the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee outside of the irreconcilable group, which have stood from the beginning against any sort of league.

Again, I think that in view of the vote in the Senate it is rather a delicate thing to make the statement that my friend from Arkansas has made.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. GARRETT. Does not the gentleman think that we ought to leave the Senate proceedings to the Senate itself for discussion?

Mr. FESS. I would state to my friend that if everybody would agree to that I would. But, as the gentleman will remember the old story, I did not begin this fight.

Another fact that I will note in following the suggestion of my friend from Tennessee, I will go out of the Senate, and House also, and call attention to the fact that some of the most distinguished Democratic leaders in the Nation have also urged that the matter be settled and settled upon the basis presented by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT. Reserving the right to object, I am not a stickler about these matters, but is it the purpose of the gentleman from Ohio in extending his remarks to enter into an analysis of the vote in the Senate on this matter and put that into the RECORD? Of course, I think it is in violation of the rules of the House. If that is the purpose, much as I would regret to interfere with my friend from Ohio, I should be compelled to object, because I think it is in plain violation of the rules of the House and would be a greater offense to print it in the RECORD than to say it on the floor.

Mr. FESS. I am not violating the rules of the House. I am not quoting any Senator nor using the Senate's action to influence any vote of a Member of the House on a question before us. I am simply stating what the vote was on the treaty, which is not before us for action and can not be influenced by this House, all of which is now a matter of record.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Ohio suggests that he did not start this. As I understand, he discussed the former action of the Senate and put it in the RECORD some time ago.

It is a great public question, and the spirit of the rule was to avoid such reference to the Senate action as might cause friction between the two Houses. If the gentleman from Ohio is prepared to agree that when some gentleman on this side desired to discuss this matter they will permit full and free discussion on both sides, I think it would be perfectly proper.

I think it is a great public question, and I think it can be discussed by Members of the House without transgressing the spirit of the rule, but it is against the rules of the House to refer to the action of the other body by reading the votes in the Senate.

Mr. FESS. I could not make any promise as to what the individual Members of this side of the House would do, but the gentleman knows that I would not make any objection, and, more than that, I think the gentleman knows that I will not violate the rules of the House.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, yes; but I simply call attention to that, and I hope that no gentleman on either side will object to a proper discussion of the treaty.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will pardon me, I think he is in error in saying that it is against the rule to refer to the action of the other body.

Mr. WINGO. I was once or twice called down by Republican leaders for doing that very thing. It is against the rule to read votes in the Senate and has been so ruled.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mere facts as to action, I think, are admissible.

Mr. WINGO. I think, as far as the spirit of the rule is concerned, that is correct, and, further, I think it is a silly rule. This is the only place on earth where legitimate criticism and discussion of the action of the Senate of the United States is frowned upon and prohibited by the rules.

Mr. CARAWAY. And it is the only place where it is not indulged in. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am surprised to learn of my friend's ambition in that direction. The situation may change when he gets there.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I shall not object, as I think Members of the House should be given the right to fully discuss the action of the Senate on the treaty, of course obeying the general rule to discuss it temperately and with decorum and respect, as I am confident the gentleman from Ohio will do.

Mr. FESS. Now that the fight is ended in the Senate, it is proper to review the events.

In December, 1918, the President with his retinue went to Europe. It was well understood he would use his influence for a league. This story has often been told.

On January 25, 1919, the war council decided to report favorably. February 14 the constitution of the league was published in Europe and America. When the country declined to withhold debate, the President demanded its acceptance without change.

Upon his return from Europe in February he reported his work in a speech in Boston, in which he warned the country that these are the times when if Governments do not do what is wanted the people will change the Governments.

On February 26 he told the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate and House the league must be accepted as written.

He was served with a notice signed by 39 Senators, 7 more than the necessary number to defeat it, that the league as written could not and would not be accepted. These 39 were from the party in control of the Senate, and did not include others not among the signers and not of the party in power who would also join the 39.

This was official notice to the President that the league must be modified or else separated from the treaty, or else the treaty would go down with the league. On the 4th of March, before he sailed the second time for Europe, he said in New York:

"The first thing that I am going to tell the people on the other side of the water is that an overwhelming majority of the American people is in favor of the League of Nations. I know that that is true." He also declared his determination to bring back the treaty so involved as to prevent separate consideration and thus compel the adoption of the league at the cost of the loss of the treaty when he announced to the country that, "When the treaty comes back gentlemen on this side will find the covenant not only in it, but so many threads of the treaty tied to the covenant that you can not dissect the covenant from the treaty without destroying the whole vital structure."

Europe even then displayed a willingness to separate the league, which decision was acceded to by our American members of peace council. But the President vetoed this action upon his landing. The country is familiar with the Lansing tragedy, which began when he declined to let his mind run with that of his chief. Bullitt's testimony was the second item in this historical drama. Col. House's isolation was another scene. Some changes were made in the constitution of the league in accordance with criticisms by Americans intent on better protection of the Nation.

Then began the struggle by the Senate to secure copy of treaty, on sale in Europe; and several copies having reached this country, Senator BORAH having secured a copy from a newspaper correspondent, read it into the RECORD June 10. July 10 the President made his first formal and official pronunciamento in an address before Congress.

The most significant utterance in this official decree was in the following words: "It—the League of Nations—must be accepted at whatever cost of independent action of the Government." This frank demand of the surrender of our national independence, if necessary, aroused the Nation. No one knew it better than the President. Then began the effort through individual conferences with Senators called to the White House from July 17 to August 1.

On August 19 the conference with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee was held at the White House. No agreement having been reached, the President entered upon his famous "swing around the circle" on September 3. On September 6 he reached the climax in Kansas City where he frankly declared that the cause of the league was greater than the Government. His exact words were: "I have come out to fight for a cause. That cause is greater than the Senate; it is greater than the Government. It is as great as the cause of mankind."

This quieted those among the friends of the league who had persisted that independence and sovereignty of the Nation were not involved.

On September 10 the Senate Foreign Relations Committee reported to the Senate the treaty with reservations. This was the Senate's specific challenge for Americanizing the treaty against the President's remarkable statement that the league was of more importance than the Government itself. The appeal to the country was cut short by the unfortunate illness of the President which still distresses the country. The Senate adopted the committee's reservations by very decisive majorities, commanding all the Republican votes in the Senate and from four to seven Democrats.

The President on the 18th of November, in a letter to Senator HITCHCOCK, instructed all friends of the treaty to vote against ratification if the reservations were attached. His language was, "I trust all true friends of the treaty will refuse to support the Lodge resolution."

Soon after the vote came on ratification with reservations, which was rejected 39 to 55. There were 35 Republicans and 4 Democrats for it, and 42 Democrats and 13 Republicans against it. Upon reconsideration the vote stood 41 for it and 51 against it—7 Democrats voting for it. Then the vote was on ratifying without reservations. The vote stood 38 for and 53 against; 37 Democrats and 1 Republican for and 46 Republicans and 7 Democrats against.

The treaty was rejected because of the dispute over the league on November 19, four months after it had been submitted to the Senate by the President. Three months later, February 19, 1920, by suspension of the rules of the Senate it was again taken up. The country is quite familiar with the details of the struggle since that date. The most significant event was the utterance of Ambassador Grey in his letter to the London Times, in which he clearly set forth to the English public the real situation here, which was not understood by a people whose government was that of the responsible ministry, where the government's act is that of the people until reversed by their vote. He also explained how the President could be repudiated and still retain his official position, which does not obtain as it does in England, where his act is that of the country which he represents. Grey also notified Americans that England would accept the treaty with the reservations. This nullified the President's declaration that he could not accept the reservations because our associates would not accept them.

It was also announced that France and Italy would accept the treaty with reservations.

The country, greatly distressed over the slow recovery of the President's health, was shocked over the dismissal of Secretary Lansing at this critical time, made more so because of the Mexican disturbances, which the Secretary of State was handling in consultation with the other members of the Cabinet.

The President, resuming his leadership so long in abeyance because of his state of health, again informed the Senate he would not agree to compromise. The efforts of the bipartisan committee were of no avail. The President made it clear that all reservationists were nullifiers, and he could see no difference between a nullifier and a mild nullifier. He had said to all Republican and Democratic Senators, "Sign here." Now, his answer to his Democratic friends who propose a compromise is the decisive and short command, "Not acceptable."

On March 18 the Lodge reservations safeguarding American sovereignty and independence were again adopted by a decisive vote.

They were attached at once to the treaty which was to be voted upon. Democratic organs urged their acceptance and ratification. Democratic statesmen joined in the plea. Democratic Senators pleaded for it. On March 19, just one month after it was again taken up and four months after it was first defeated, the President's influence again killed the treaty.

The war is still on technically. There has not been a time since September 10, when the Senate first reported the resolutions, that the war could not have been ended in 48 hours had the President been willing to abide by a majority of the Senate.

It still goes on, and will so continue until by act of Congress it is ended.

The treaty seems dead. The league becomes an issue in the next election.

No matter what is the result of the vote, under our system President Wilson will be President until March 4, 1921. There is no constitutional power to compel him to submit to the verdict of the people as there was not when he was rebuked in the last election of the present Congress.

Republicans will accept his challenge to carry the contest to the people.

He has made it an issue. We will meet it under a full realization that no political party has ever won nor will it ever win a contest when it takes the foreign side of an international issue. Republicans will stand on the American side of this issue, and they will meet their foes under the leadership of any internationalist.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair would state that there have been several speeches made in committee to-day that came very close at least to the line of infringing the rule about reference to the Senate. The Chair did not make any suggestion to gentlemen, partly because the matter referred to was of very recent occurrence and a very active matter, and partly because the rule and the principle of the rule in respect to respectful reference to the proceedings in the Senate is based upon the idea that the action of the House should not be influenced on a subject matter by the action of the Senate on the same subject matter. Of course, with the subject matter referred to to-day, the House has nothing whatever to do.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee does not desire to use the balance of his time?

Mr. PADGETT. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the naval service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. WALSH) having resumed the chair, Mr. MANN of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13108, the naval appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi for 10 days, on account of sickness in family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the railroad bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, March 22, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 22, 1920.

Rev. Daniel S. Tuttle, Bishop of Missouri and Presiding Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, we thank Thee for our country and our flag, and the abounding mercies and favors that Thy benign providence has showered upon our whole land. Grant, we beseech Thee, merciful Lord, to us pardon and peace, that we may be cleansed from all our sins and serve Thee with a loyal mind.

Direct the Senate this day and all its days of session with Thy most gracious favor, and further it with Thy continual help, that in the day's work, begun, continued, and ended in Thee, its Members may glorify Thy holy name and finally by Thy mercy obtain everlasting life. Through Jesus Christ our Lord, in whose name and whose own words we sum up these our prayers:

"Our Father who art in heaven. Hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory. For ever and ever. Amen."

On request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Federal Trade Commission transmitting, pursuant to law, a special report dealing with the subject of commercial bribery, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12467) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11927) to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Coast Guard through the temporary provision of bonuses or increased compensation, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BUTLER, Mr. BROWNING, Mr. KELLEY of Michigan, Mr. PADGETT, and Mr. RIORDAN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 11309) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to fix compensation of certain laborers in the Customs Service, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a certified copy of joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of New Mexico ratifying the proposed Susan B. Anthony amendment to the Constitution, which will be filed.

TARIFF ON BUTTONS.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7705) to amend section 339 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913, in respect to the tariff on buttons of shell and pearl, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 483) thereon.

BUILDINGS AT CAMP FUNSTON, KANS.

Mr. MYERS. I report back favorably with amendments from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill (S. 3706) authorizing the Secretary of War to make settlement with the lessees who erected buildings on a five-year lease on the zone at Camp Funston, Kans., and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 485) thereon.

In this connection I wish to state that the bill was carefully investigated by the subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs, which reported in its favor, and the full committee unanimously recommended the bill for passage with an amendment. The amendment recommended by the full committee is to strike out the proviso at the end of the bill. As amended the bill has the hearty approval of the Secretary of War, as shown in a letter from him embodied in the report of the committee. I ask that the bill may be read, and I call it to the attention of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

The bill was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Before giving consent, I should like to have the Senator from Kansas make some explanation of the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the concessionaires erected the buildings referred to in the bill at the request of the War Department and paid for them under five-year leases. Before the five years had expired, however, and after the leases had run but two years, the War Department canceled the leases and are now using the buildings. Some three or four of the concessionaires have lost money by reason of the cancellation of the leases. The claims all told will not amount to over $140,000, while the department derived as revenue out of the matter over $205,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Were the buildings erected for war activities?

Mr. CURTIS. They were and were erected on the military reservation.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments. On page 1, line 7, after the word "Kansas," to strike out the period and insert a comma; and in the same line, after the word "Kansas," to strike out "The" and insert "the"; and on the same page, after the word "holders," to strike out the colon and insert a period; and to strike out the proviso, as follows:

Provided, That if the amount which the Secretary of War agrees to pay to any lessee is unsatisfactory to the lessee entitled to receive the same, said lessee shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the Secretary of War, and shall be entitled to sue the United States, in the United States District Court for the District of Kansas, to recover such further sum as added to said 75 per cent will make up such amount as will be just and a fair settlement therefor.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to make such settlement as he thinks just and proper, with the several lessees who erected buildings under a five-year lease, with renewal clauses, on the zone of Camp Funston activities and amusements, at Camp Funston, Kans., the buildings having been erected under the authority of the War Department and at the invitation of the Department of Camp Activities, under leases which were properly approved, but which have been canceled before the expiration of any of said leases, and over the protest of the holders.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDRESS BY ROME G. BROWN.

Mr. MOSES, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 335), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the manuscript entitled "Address before the Middlesex County Bar Association on Americanism v. Socialism," delivered by Rome G. Brown, and submitted to the Senate by Senator KELLOGG on February 15, 1920, be printed as a Senate document.

ADDRESS BY JOHN BASSETT MOORE.

Mr. MOSES, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 336), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the manuscript entitled "Address on the Work of the International High Commission," delivered by John Bassett Moore at the Second Pan American Conference, and submitted to the Senate by Senator FLETCHER on February 13, 1920, be printed as a Senate document.

BOLSHEVIST MOVEMENT IN RUSSIA.

Mr. MOSES, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred Senate resolution 318, submitted by Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN on the 2d instant, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That 2,500 additional copies of Senate Document No. 172, Sixty-sixth Congress, second session, entitled "Bolshevist Movement in Russia," be printed for the use of the Senate.

RELIEF OF EUROPEANS.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Finance I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 12954) providing for the relief of populations in Europe and in countries contiguous thereto suffering for want of food, and I submit a report (No. 486) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. GORE. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah if he will insist upon the present consideration of the bill if it leads to protracted debate?

Mr. SMOOT. If it leads to any protracted debate I will withdraw the request.

Mr. GORE. I think we ought to have the morning hour for the transaction of morning business.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that if we are going to give any relief at all it ought to be extended at once; and I do not believe that the bill will lead to any debate.

Mr. GORE. I appreciate the emergency of this measure. My only suggestion is that it be delayed for 15 or 20 minutes, until we finish the regular call.

Mr. SMOOT. I repeat, if the bill leads to any debate, I will withdraw the request for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object, I should like to have the bill read.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to have the bill read before I state whether or not I shall object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, for the participation of the Government of the United States in the furnishing of foodstuffs to populations in Europe and countries contiguous thereto suffering for the want of food, the United States Grain Corporation is hereby authorized, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to sell or dispose of flour now in its possession, not to exceed 5,000,000 barrels, for cash or on credit at such prices and on such terms or conditions as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act and to relieve populations in the countries of Europe or countries contiguous thereto suffering for the want of food: Provided, That an audited, itemized report of the receipts and expenditures of the United States Grain Corporation for the purposes authorized by this act shall be submitted to Congress not later than the first Monday in December, 1920.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senate in a few words that the sales under the provisions of this legislation are limited to flour now in the possession of the United States Grain Corporation. This flour, the product of soft wheat, is perishable, and there is no ready domestic market for it. Hence its sale abroad is expedient, and it will not affect the home supply of foodstuffs. In other words, if this flour is not disposed of in Europe it is impossible to carry it over another season, and it will be a loss.

Mr. THOMAS. In other words, it will spoil.

Mr. SMOOT. It will spoil, as the Senator from Colorado states.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Some time ago there was another bill introduced, and I think perhaps it passed the House——

Mr. SMOOT. It did not pass the House. I presume the Senator has in mind the bill appropriating $50,000,000.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; it authorized a loan, as I recall, to foreign Governments. What, if anything, has been done in regard to that matter?

Mr. SMOOT. This bill has been substituted for that bill in the House, I will say to the Senator, and this is the only relief measure that is asked of Congress at the present time.

Mr. POMERENE. What is the probable present value of this flour?

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is valued at about $50,000,000.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, can the Senator from Utah tell me what has been the prevailing price per barrel for flour in the last month or so?

Mr. SMOOT. For this class of flour the price is $10.65 a barrel.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Has the Senator any information as to why this flour or any portion of it has not been sold to the people of this country?

Mr. SMOOT. There is very little call for this class of flour; it is made of soft wheat.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What is the price of the best grade of flour per barrel?

Mr. SMOOT. The wholesale price is between $13 and $14.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. While there may have been very little call for this grade of flour, if it had been offered on the market, does not the Senator think it could have been sold and would have relieved the high price of flour in this country?

Mr. SMOOT. I have been informed that it has always been on the market, and could have been sold at any time; but there is not the demand for it that there is for flour made from hard wheat.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, does the Senator happen to know why this much soft wheat was converted into flour, instead of being mixed with spring wheat and made into a merchantable flour?

Mr. SMOOT. I have no information on that point.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I want to say just a word with reference to this legislation.

This is another illustration of what happens when we have Government officials interfering with private business. When the law providing for a minimum guarantee of wheat was enacted by Congress, I doubt if any Member of Congress anticipated that any such thing would be undertaken as for the Grain Director to go into the manufacture of flour.

Mr. President, this bill speaks for itself, and the statement made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is absolutely correct so far as I understand it. This flour has been on the market at all times, and the Grain Corporation has expended large sums of money advertising it at a price much lower than the price of white patent flour, which is being used by the American people; but they have refused to buy it. One of the large grain dealers from the seaboard testified before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry that he had purchased 4,000 barrels of this flour, but upon information that it was impossible to dispose of it he naturally canceled the order.

Mr. President, I have no objection to any legislation to authorize the Government to help the starving people of Europe. On the contrary, I am in favor of it; but what right had the Grain Director to go into the business of manufacturing flour—flour which the people of the the United States will not use? Is not this bill evidence that unless we could now send it across to the starving people of Europe, there would have been a loss of between fifty and sixty million dollars right here?

Mr. President, I have criticized the Grain Corporation, and I think some of the Senators coming from States where they do not produce wheat have believed that I have made the criticisms simply because I come from a wheat State. I believe I may say that I am broad minded enough to have the interests of the people of other States—of the cotton States and the manufacturing States—at heart as well as those of the people of my own State. When I found out that the Grain Corporation was going into the manufacturing business, I believed that it was a mistake, and I was not afraid to say so; and this demonstrates it, as the Senator from Utah says. But the mistake has been made, and of course we have to take the results.

I would have been much happier if we could have taken first-class flour manufactured by the mills of the United States and shipped it across to the starving people of Europe, rather than to have to admit that we are sending them flour which we do not care to use. To me, it is a humiliating proposition to have to admit that we are dealing here with a food product which the American people refuse to use.

Of course, I shall not object to the consideration nor to the passage of the bill, but I simply want to remind Senators now that it is time to call a halt on this unwarranted interference by some of these officials who have no authority whatever under any law, as far as I know, to transact their business in the way that it has been transacted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

A bill (S. 4108) enabling members of Naval Reserve Force to secure honorable discharges; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 4115) granting an increase of pension to Charles M. Gregory (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DIAL (by request):

A bill (S. 4116) for the relief of Elizabeth R. Nicholls and Joanna L. Nicholls, heirs of Joshua Nicholls, deceased (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. COLT:

A bill (S. 4117) referring the claim of the State of Rhode Island for expenses during the War with Spain to the Court of Claims for adjudication; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 4118) to amend further the new Judicial Code; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 4120) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant further extension of time within which to make proof on desert-land entries; to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have received a bill from the Secretary of Commerce, with the suggestion that it be introduced. In accordance with that request, I send to the desk the bill for introduction and reference.

The bill (S. 4110) to provide for the award of a medal of merit to the personnel of the merchant marine of the United States of America was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPEAL OF THE LEVER ACT.

Mr. GORE. I introduce a joint resolution to repeal the so-called Lever Act, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

I wish to say that I have deferred the introduction of this joint resolution until the failure of the peace treaty. This was a war measure, and the excuse for its enactment has now passed. Its continuance is fraught with danger to business, labor, and the farmers.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the vote the other day, I should like to ask the Senator whether he considers that the peace treaty has been effectually disposed of?

Mr. GORE. I used the expression "failure of the peace treaty" rather as a converse of success. Certainly it was not a success.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think a similar bill was presented the other day by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. GORE. I am not advised as to that. I hope so, and I hope that one is in contemplation by every Member of the Senate. I think we ought to begin now to clean up on this war legislation. It was proper to wait until the fate of the treaty was known.

Mr. POMERENE. A bill providing for the repeal of some features of the legislation was presented, and I thought it was referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee. Perhaps I am wrong about that.

Mr. GORE. I asked to have this joint resolution referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry because that committee reported the original bill, which is now the law.

Mr. POMERENE. That is true.

Mr. GORE. Properly, this joint resolution would go to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 175) to repeal the so-called Lever Act, approved August 10, 1917, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT ON TREATIES.

Mr. OWEN. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 176) to amend Article V of the Constitution was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two thirds of each House concurring therein), That in pursuance of Article V of the Constitution of the United States the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided by the Constitution:

ARTICLE —.

The President shall have power, by and with the advice of the Senate, to frame treaties, and, with the consent of the Senate, a majority of the Senate present concurring therein, to conclude the same.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. McNARY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—DANIEL H. ANKER.

On motion of Mr. MYERS, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying bill S. 2185, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, granting a pension to Daniel H. Anker, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ACTIONS FOR DEATH ON HIGH SEAS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2085) relating to the maintenance of actions for death on the high seas and other navigable waters, which was, on page 3, in lines 10 and 11, to strike out "as to causes of action accruing within the territorial limits of any State."

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 12775. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WADSWORTH submitted the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12467) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "Service detachment: For pay of service detachment"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "Extra pay of enlisted men: For extra pay of enlisted men"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "Pay of civilians: For pay of civilians"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 84, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "Miscellaneous. Course of instruction:"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 89, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "Provided further, That any cadet now at the academy may at his option, exercised prior to June 11, 1920, continue at the academy one additional year and postpone thereby his prospective graduation, and cadets not electing so to prolong their course shall be graduated in the years assigned to their respective classes prior to the passage of this act"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 90, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "Amendment to section 1318, Revised Statutes relating to appointments: That section "; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 91, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"Hotel at West Point: That the paragraph of the Military Academy appropriation act for 1920, approved March 4, 1919, relating to the erection of a hotel building at West Point, N. Y., be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows: That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to lease land on the United States Military Reservation at West Point, for a term of not exceeding 50 years, to any corporation, company, or individual, upon which to erect a hotel, and all other necessary buildings in connection therewith, in accordance with plans and specifications submitted to and recommended by the Superintendent of the Military Academy, and approved by the Secretary of War. Said lease shall contain such conditions, terms, reservations and covenants, as may be agreed upon and shall also provide for just compensation to the lessees for the construction of said hotel, appurtenances, and equipments, to be paid to said lessees at the termination of said lease."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 92, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"Ramon Ricardo Arias: The Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, in his discretion, authorized to permit one Ramon Ricardo Arias, a citizen of Panama, without expense to the United States, to receive instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point; and such student, while undergoing instruction as herein authorized, shall be accorded the same privileges as are authorized by law for cadets at the Military Academy appointed from the United States."

And the Senate agree to the same.

J. W. WADSWORTH, Jr.,
J. S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JULIUS KAHN,
J. M. MORIN,
J. W. WISE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York briefly state what changes have been made in the bill as it passed the Senate?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the overwhelming majority of the amendments were amendments in the printing of the bill in the captions of different sections and subdivisions. There were something like 90 of those. The Senate committee redrafted the bill in that respect in order to have it conform more nearly to the standard form of bill drafting as suggested by the printer.

The pay of master of the sword at the academy was raised $500. That was one amendment. Then the phrase of the bill, which was agreed to by both Houses in different forms, which permits cadets now at the Military Academy to stay there at their choice for an additional year was redrafted.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the provision which allows the cadets to remain at the academy four years instead of three years?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. We establish the four-year course at the Military Academy; and we permit the cadets now there to elect whether or not they shall be graduated at the time heretofore planned for their graduation or shall remain at the academy one additional year, prolonging their course by that length of time. Aside from that there were no differences between the two Houses. The amount of the bill is not raised by the conference report over the amount carried as the bill passed the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

THE SHOE INDUSTRY.

Mr. McNARY. Out of order, I ask unanimous consent, on behalf of the Committee on Manufactures, to submit a report on Senate resolution 317, proposing an investigation by the Committee on Manufactures into the cost of shoes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be received and placed on the calendar.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico subsequently said:

I desire to call attention to the resolution which was reported from the Committee on Manufactures a few moments ago and sent to the calendar. To my mind, the course of that resolution has been a very proper one, except its going to the calendar. The resolution was originally introduced by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] and referred to the Committee on Manufactures. The Committee on Manufactures investigated the subject and decided that the purpose of the resolution should be carried out. But it is necessary, it seems to me, that the resolution be now referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as the expenses of the investigation are to be paid for out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. That will be absolutely necessary under the statute, if it has not already been done.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Under the statute it is necessary; and I make the suggestion that the resolution be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if it is not true that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate has given the committee authority now to hold hearings during this session?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not know about that, but it seems to me that if the Committee on Manufactures already has authority to hold hearings which would cover this subject, then this resolution is unnecessary. However, if the resolution is necessary, then it seems to me it should be referred now to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. That has not been the practice of the Senate, Mr. President. The practice is that at the beginning of a session of Congress the important committees of the Senate ask by resolution that they be authorized to hold hearings upon subjects matter that are referred to their committees; but in every case they have had a resolution passed by the Senate authorizing the particular hearing. I will say to the Senator if there is not a general resolution passed for that committee this resolution will necessarily have to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If there has been general authorization from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, then, of course, the Senator from Utah would be perfectly right; but I do not know of any such authority.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico and I are both on the Committee on Manufactures, and I do not think they have any general resolution. Certainly I have never heard of it. I think possibly the resolution will have to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate; but information in regard to the matter can be secured by simply asking the clerk of the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. SMOOT. The best way would be to refer it to that committee.

Mr. McNARY. I have been informed that general authority has been conferred on the Committee on Manufactures to conduct the investigation. In any event, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be taken from the calendar and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not advised with respect to the terms of the resolution; but if it involves the payment of money from the contingent fund of the Senate, it must go to that committee. Is there objection to the unanimous consent asked by the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desire again to state that I commend highly the course of this resolution, and it seems to me that all similar resolutions ought to take a similar course. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Manufactures, the committee which would carry on the investigation. That committee inquired into the merits of the resolution, and after such inquiry reported it to the Senate with a recommendation that it be passed, and now, under the statute, the resolution is referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate for that committee to determine whether or not funds are available for the purpose provided for in the resolution.

NATIONAL CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC OF AMERICA.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 1551) to amend an act approved March 3, 1891, incorporating the National Conservatory of Music of America, and I submit a report (No. 484) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] to the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may have immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMAS. Let the bill be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There is a long list of names of incorporators. I suggest that in the reading of the bill the Secretary may skip that, and come to the substance of the bill. It simply amends an act of incorporation which was passed in 1891.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, the Secretary need not read it, as far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, constituting the persons therein named a body politic and corporate by the name National Conservatory of Music of America, is hereby amended by substituting the names of Henry White, George Peabody Eustis, Charles D. Walcott, Mary Harrison McKee, Anna Cochran Ewing, Lillia Babbitt Hyde, Helen Hartley Jenkins, Dorothy Whitney Straight, Jeannette M. Thurber, Thomas Ewing, George McAneny, and Ernest M. Stires in place of Abram S. Hewitt, Frank R. Lawrence, William Pinckney Whyte, Enoch Pratt, Fitz Hugh Lee, William H. Payne, Olive Risley Seward, John Hay, S. P. Langley, Anthony Pollock, C. R. P. Rodgers, and John M. Scofield, and that said National Conservatory of Music of America may establish and maintain branches outside the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That the power to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will state that the bill simply authorizes a musical association which was incorporated in 1891 to have branches elsewhere than in the District of Columbia. That is all there is to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall vote against this bill, and I want just one moment to invite attention to the fact that the Congress of the United States upon numerous occasions has committed an indiscretion, an act of impropriety, and, indeed, almost one of usurpation, in granting charters to private individuals for private corporations. It has provided for the incorporation of organizations not at all connected with governmental questions or the fiscal operations of the Government. I doubt the authority of the Federal Government to grant such charters. Certainly it is unwise and highly improper.

I would urge that the Senate defeat the amendment just offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], except for the fact that the charter was granted a number of years ago, and this is a proper amendment to the charter. But it is a very absurd proceeding to have Congress passing a special bill to amend the charter of a private corporation, organized for musical purposes, so as to enable it to hold meetings in two places instead of one, or to increase the personnel of the organization. It shows the impropriety of such a course. There ought to be and there is a general incorporation act, under which individuals may form corporations for legitimate and proper purposes within the District of Columbia. I hope that Congress will pass no more private incorporation acts.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLASSIFICATION OF CIVILIAN POSITIONS.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico introduced a bill (S. 4106) to provide for the classification of civilian positions within the District of Columbia and the standardization of compensation therefor, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, this bill is introduced at the suggestion of the Joint Commission on Reclassification of Salaries. It involves two classes of work. The most important part of it relates to the classification of positions in the civil service of the Government. An additional feature of the bill is an appropriation to carry out the purposes of the bill, and the suggestion has been made to me that it should be referred to a joint committee composed of the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. It is immaterial to me, of course, where the bill shall go, but it involves the work of those two committees.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the only classification of employment we have in the Government to-day has always been——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. I demand the regular order. There is not anything before the Senate that is subject to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask for a proper reference of the bill, and will leave it for the Chair to determine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will refer the bill to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. SMOOT. There is an appropriation provided for in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Utah desires, he can move that the reference be changed. The Chair is not familiar with the bill except as stated by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SMOOT. The whole subject matter in the past has been handled by the Committee on Appropriations. It involves an appropriation and also a reclassification of the employees of the Government. All other past reclassifications have been handled by the Committee on Appropriations. It does seem to me that if any bill ever introduced in this Chamber should be referred to the Appropriations Committee that is the committee to which this bill ought to go.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah moves that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If it is in order, I believe I should like to amend that motion by moving to have it referred to a joint committee composed of the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. LODGE. Is a discussion as to the reference of the bill in order now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that it is not in order. There can be no debate upon the question at this time.

Mr. LODGE. The question of the change of reference having been disposed of, I should like to offer a Senate resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Massachusetts surprises me. The time to debate a question is after it is disposed of. That is the way we do here.

Mr. LODGE. I agree with the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in the power of the Senate to make any reference of a bill that it desires.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senate has already referred the bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

SALE OF SHIPS.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, several weeks ago we had up before the Senate the question as to what is to be the policy of the Congress with reference to the sale of Government-owned vessels. It was reported at that time that the Shipping Board was about to make sale of a large and valuable part of the tonnage owned by the United States. Senators will recall that at that time there was a very strong protest against the sale, and as a result the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] introduced a bill the general effect of which was to instruct the Shipping Board not to proceed with further sales of Government-owned ships until Congress shall have had an opportunity to declare its policy in respect to that question. An injunction was also granted by one of the Federal courts in this district against the sale of the ships.

Those of us who were opposed to that proposed action on the part of the Shipping Board, of course, expected that the action taken upon the part of the Senate and the action of the court would stop the sale of ships.

I am in receipt of some telegrams, which I will not take the time of the Senate to read, but which I wish to incorporate in the RECORD, protesting against certain sales that have been made since the injunction referred to and since the introduction of the bill by the Senator from Washington, calling my attention to the fact also that other sales are in contemplation. I have called this matter up for the purpose of inquiring of the Senator from Washington, who is chairman of the Committee on Commerce, what has been done with reference to the bill which he introduced, and if we may expect that it may come before the Senate at any time in the near future?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The bill to which the Senator refers related only to the ex-German ships. It did not relate to any other ships owned by the Government. I think the Senator called my attention to the telegrams which he has, and those telegrams, my understanding is, referred to sale of other ships than the German ships. The bill relating to the German ships is on the calendar, and, as the Senator knows, we have had no opportunity since it was introduced to call it up. Furthermore, the sale is stopped by the injunction proceeding in the court.

Then a subcommittee, of which the Senator is a member, of the Committee on Commerce has been appointed and has begun the preparation of a bill to determine the policy of the Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator think that the matter ought to be left there? Does he not think, on the contrary, that something ought to be done to stop the sale of ships other than the so-called German ships until Congress can have an opportunity to express its views with reference to this very important question?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, Congress has expressed its views—I do not refer to the present Congress—but the Shipping Board is acting under legislation enacted by Congress authorizing the sale of ships. I do not believe, however, that there is any need of special haste with reference to the sale of ships aside from the German ships. The ships referred to in the telegrams which the Senator has are what would be called small ships—ships of 3,000, 4,000, or 5,000 tons.

Some time ago I had a telegram and also a letter similar in import to the telegrams which the Senator has, and when Chairman Payne was before the Committee on Commerce I asked with reference to those particular sales. My recollection is that the Shipping Board has sold about 17 of those small ships, I think to Norway and Sweden, and they have sold them at $200 a ton, considered the full and even cost value of the ship. We have some four or five hundred of those ships. The sale of 17 or 18 or 20 is comparatively nothing. There is no apparent prospect of the sale of any considerable number of those ships in the very near future. I do not think there is any likelihood of a sale of any considerable number of them before we get our policy developed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator further, Is it his opinion that they have not sold any ships of more than 6,000 tons?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not like to interrupt, but I must ask for the regular order.

Mr. LODGE. I think we ought to have the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). The Senator from Colorado calls for the regular order.

Mr. SIMMONS. I submit the telegrams for printing in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CINCINNATI, OHIO, March 11, 1920.

Senator FURNIFOLD M. SIMMONS,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

The Mid West, Gulf, South Atlantic Foreign Trade and Transportation Committee protests recent action of Shipping Board in selling steel vessels under 6,000 tons. We demand passage of bill prohibiting sale of steel cargo vessels until Congress shall have determined ultimate policy and standing of Shipping Board. Present action of Shipping Board sale of vessels to foreign interest. Undesirable vessels will be left for American interests and an American merchant marine but a name.

J. B. MORROW,
Vice Chairman Mid West, Gulf, South Atlantic Foreign Trade and Transportation Committee.

BRUNSWICK, GA., March 11, 1920.

F. M. SIMMONS,
Senate Commerce Committee, Washington, D. C.:

We desire to protest against sale of Government-owned steel ships under 6,000 tons to Belgian, French, or any other buyers; and in the interest of America's foreign trade desire to strongly urge passage of bill prohibiting sale of these ships.

BRUNSWICK BOARD OF TRADE.

Mr. SIMMONS subsequently said: Mr. President, I do not wish to say anything upon the bill, but as there is some business new pending before the Senate now I propose to take a moment to finish the statement which I was making a little while ago when some impatient Senators suggested that there was nothing pending before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). The Senator may proceed for five minutes under the rule.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is quite all the time I wish to take.

I was discussing the question of the sale of ships. It was suggested by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, that there have been some sales recently, since the very pronounced and emphatic expressions on the part of the Senate of our opposition to the Shipping Board's disposing of ships without waiting for the consent of Congress or without giving it an opportunity to express itself with reference to the sale of these ships.

It is now suggested that the ships which were then about to be sold were the German ships, and, inasmuch as the sale of those ships has been stopped by reason of injunction and by reason of the introduction of a resolution or a bill in the Senate instructing the board not to act, the matter might drop there. Mr. President, I do not wish it to drop there. If Congress has expressed its will in a joint resolution with reference to the sale of the German ships, I am unable to understand why the Shipping Board should not regard that expression with reference to the German ships as applying equally with reference to any other Government-owned ships. The so-called German ships have no features different from any other ships that may be owned by the Government. The manifest purpose of the Congress in passing the resolution, and giving that expression to its will, applied to all ships, and every subordinate agency of this Government ought to have recognized that fact. They ought to have stopped the sale of the ships until Congress could act, or until at least they could get an expression from the committee of this body having charge of the subject.

Mr. OWEN rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have only five minutes. If I had time, I should gladly yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

I have no earthly objection to the sale of a small vessel that by reason of its size or by reason of the material out of which it is constructed is not suitable for economical service in our foreign trade; but I do protest against an agency of the Government undertaking to decide and to act upon a policy binding the Government with reference to any of the ships which we built during the war if those ships are suitable to our foreign trade, and especially if they constitute a part of the merchant marine.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. I do not understand, Mr. President, that the Shipping Board is offering for sale any vessels having a greater dead-weight capacity than 4,500 tons.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the Senator if some of the steel vessels they have been selling are not suitable for the foreign trade?

Mr. McNARY. I do not so understand.

Mr. SIMMONS. If they are not, then, I have no objection to their action; but, Mr. President, if this board, in the face of what has transpired here in the Senate, presumes to go on and sell the smaller vessels without taking the advice of the committee having charge of this matter, how do we know that they are not going to assume authority to sell larger vessels, and then hide themselves behind the statement that the Senate has only expressed itself with reference to the German ships?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from North Carolina that they should not sell these ships until a policy in reference to the matter has been framed by Congress, and I think that is the state of mind of the members of the Shipping Board.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am very glad to hear the Senator say that. He is a member of the committee; he has attended the hearings and I have not; but, Mr. President, I want to have it distinctly understood, so far as I am concerned, that if the Shipping Board, in advance of action by this body, proceeds to sell any ship that is properly a part of our merchant marine, for the purpose of engaging in our foreign trade, I am in favor of calling them strictly to account and demanding that they shall withhold action with reference to this property of the United States until Congress shall have acted, especially inasmuch as the Senate has expressed its will so clearly and so emphatically with reference to the subject.

THE ISLAND OF YAP.

Mr. LODGE. I offer the following Senate resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 337) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to inform the Senate whether the island of Yap is to be given to Japan, as recently announced by the British prime minister, and what, if anything, has been done by the Government of the United States to assure to the United States the possession of this island in accordance with the statements made by the President to the Committee on Foreign Relations on August 19, 1919.

Mr. LODGE. I ask permission to have printed with the resolution a letter from the American Asiatic Association in regard to this matter, and also the statement by the President in regard to it made to the Foreign Relations Committee August 19, 1919.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN ASIATIC ASSOCIATION,
New York, March 17, 1920.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: On behalf of of the executive committee of the American Asiatic Association I beg to submit to you the following resolutions adopted at the meeting of the committee on March 12:

"Whereas the sealing of the cables connecting the United States station at Guam through the island of Yap with Shanghai and the Celebes has been a serious handicap to the Far Eastern commerce of the United States as well as to that of the countries of eastern Asia, and that the early resumption of this service is of pressing necessity; and

"Whereas the award of national control of the cable station at Yap now rests with the supreme council of the allied and associated powers: Be it

"Resolved, That the American Asiatic Association place on record their sense of the supreme importance to the commercial interests of the United States of the possession of sovereignty over the island of Yap, so that the cable system radiating from Guam should be subject to no interruption of control, and its development be made possible on the lines best fitted to insure economy and efficiency of service; further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States and the Secretary of State."

Our purpose in bringing these to your attention is to justify what we conceive ought to be a resolute and united American opposition to the decision just announced by the British prime minister of allocating to Japan the mandate for "the German islands north of the equator," of which Yap is one.

Should the permanent occupancy of Yap be conceded to Japan she will control America's most direct cable line to the East Indies and one of its alternate lines to China. Since the Yap cables were sealed cablegrams for the East Indies have circulated through the Philippines, Hongkong, Singapore, or through Europe, India, and Singapore. Lying between Guam and the Philippines, Yap is a station from which three cables radiate, one to Guam, another to the East Indies, and another to China.

I think you will agree with us that, in the interests of American commerce, some action ought to be taken to prevent so inopportune a bestowal of one of the mandates for the former German islands in the Pacific.

I have the honor to be,

Respectfully, yours,

JOHN FOORD, Secretary.

"The CHAIRMAN. Going now onto another question, as I understand the treaty the overseas possessions of Germany are all made over to the five principal allied and associated powers, who apparently, as far as the treaty goes, have power to make disposition of them, I suppose by way of mandate or otherwise. Among those overseas possessions are the Ladrone Islands, except Guam, the Carolines, and, I think, the Marshall Islands. Has there been any recommendation made by our naval authorities in regard to the importance of our having one island there, not for territorial purposes, but for naval purposes?

"The PRESIDENT. There was a paper on that subject, Senator, which has been published. I only partially remember it. It was a paper laying out the general necessities of our naval policy in the Pacific, and the necessity of having some base for communication upon those islands was mentioned, just in what form I do not remember. But let me say this, there is a little island which I must admit I had not heard of before.

"Senator WILLIAMS. The island of Yap.

"The PRESIDENT. Yap. It is one of the bases and centers of cable and radio communication on the Pacific, and I made the point that the disposition, or rather the control, of that island should be reserved for the general conference which is to be held in regard to the ownership and operation of the cables. That subject is mentioned and disposed of in this treaty and that general cable conference is to be held.

"The CHAIRMAN. I had understood, or I had heard the report, that our General Board of the Navy Department and our Chief of Operations had recommended that we should have a footing there, primarily in order to secure cable communications.

"The PRESIDENT. I think you are right, sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. That we were likely to be cut off from cable communication—that is, that the cables were likely to pass entirely into other hands—unless we had some station there, and it seemed to me a matter of such importance that I asked the question.

"I wish to ask this further question: There was a secret treaty between England and Japan in regard to Shantung; and in the correspondence with the British ambassador at Tokyo, when announcing the acquiescence of Great Britain in Japan's having the German rights in Shantung, the British ambassador added:

"It is, of course, understood that we are to have the islands south of the Equator and Japan to have the islands north of the Equator.

"If it should seem necessary for the safety of communication for this country that we should have a cable station there, would that secret treaty interfere with it?

"The PRESIDENT. I think not, sir, in view of the stipulation that I made with regard to the question of construction by this cable convention. That note of the British ambassador was a part of the diplomatic correspondence covering that subject.

"The CHAIRMAN. That was what I understood.

"Senator MOSES. Was the stipulation that that should be reserved for the consideration of the cable conference a formally signed protocol?

"The PRESIDENT. No; it was not a formally signed protocol, but we had a prolonged and interesting discussion on the subject, and nobody has any doubt as to what was agreed upon.

"The CHAIRMAN. I asked the question because it seemed to me a matter of great importance.

"The PRESIDENT. Yes; it is.

"The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of self-protection, it seemed on the face of it that the treaty would give the five principal allied and associated powers the authority to make such disposition as they saw fit of those islands, but I did not know whether the secret treaty would thwart that purpose. I have no further questions to ask, Mr. President."

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. KING. I offer the following resolution, and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

The resolution (S. Res. 339) was read, as follows:

Whereas a large number of aliens are within the United States, in violation of the immigration laws, and have been permitted to remain in the United States because of the indifference of the Department of Labor with regard to the issuance of an execution of warrants for the deportation of such aliens; and

Whereas after persistent delays and through the efforts of the Department of Justice over 6,000 warrants have been issued, 3,300 of which have been executed by the taking into custody of aliens subject to deportation; and

Whereas it is claimed that the Department of Labor is not proceeding with proper expedition in such cases, but, on the contrary, is dismissing a large number of such warrants and is threatening to further dismiss more of such warrants: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Immigration is authorized and directed to investigate the administration and enforcement of the immigration laws, including the administration of the alien immigration station, Ellis Island, New York Harbor, under Frederic C. Howe, formerly in charge of such station, and the attitude and policy of the Department of Labor with respect to those provisions of the immigration law which authorize the deportation of aliens unlawfully within the United States, and report to the Senate its findings in the premises.

Mr. KING. During the day I shall seek an opportunity to make a few observations in regard to this resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Immigration.

SEPARATE LOCAL GOVERNMENTS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 338), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas the bolshevistic revolution of November, 1917, brought on a collapse of public order in Russia and has resulted in political chaos, except in those parts of Russia which have been able to prevent the extension of the bolshevistic usurpation; and

Whereas it is necessary for the liberty and protection of the people that governments be constituted to preserve public order; and

Whereas separate governments have been constituted in Esthonia, Latvia, Lithuania, and Ukraine to preserve the public order, which governments have established local authority in said countries and have prevented the bolshevistic usurpations from extending to the same; and

Whereas it will be impossible for the people of Russia to establish a federal republican government for the whole of Russia until such time as the Bolshevist usurpation succumbs; and

Whereas it is necessary that such local governments be maintained in Russia and continue provisionally until the authority of a federal republican government for the whole of Russia is established or the relations between the several territorial divisions of the former Russian Government be determined by an all-Russian constituent assembly: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Government of the United States should recognize the de facto existence of separate local governments in Esthonia, Latvia, Lithuania, and Ukraine, provisionally, until such time as the relations of such countries to Russia or the other parts of Russia are determined by an all-Russian constituent assembly or the authority of a federal republican government is established for the whole of Russia.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair, at 1.10 o'clock p. m.). Morning business is closed, and the calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, some days ago I gave notice that to-day at the close of the morning business I would address the Senate, but I shall be very glad to reserve my remarks until after the morning hour.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that we begin with Calendar No. 360, which we reached the last time the calendar was up.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator from Utah is mistaken about the place we reached on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Chair if I am mistaken.

Mr. NORRIS. I know that Calendar No. 359 had not been reached, because I was watching for that number.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that on the 9th of February, the last time the calendar was under consideration, the Senate had reached Calendar No. 335, Senate bill 310.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will change my request. I only suggested Calendar No. 360 because I was informed at the desk that we had reached that point.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, I am very glad to commence where we left off. I think we ought to do that.

The bill (S. 310) for the relief of John Murphy was announced as first in order on the calendar.

Mr. KING. I ask that that may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 5726) to fix the compensation of certain employees of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2274) for the relief of the owners of the schooner Charlotte W. Miller was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

COMMERCIAL PACIFIC CABLE CO.

The bill (S. 2452) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of the Commercial Pacific Cable Co. was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Commercial Pacific Cable Co., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $35,838.22, to reimburse said company for the cost of repairing certain damages done by the United States naval authorities to one of said company's cables in the harbor of San Luis d'Pra, Island of Guam, in September, 1907, as reported to Congress in Senate Document No. 88, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE DERRICK "CAPITOL."

The bill (S. 3293) for the relief of the owner of the derrick Capitol was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the owner of the derrick Capitol, arising out of collision between said derrick and the United States Navy tug No. 89 on April 4, 1919, at Harlem River, N. Y., for and on account of the losses alleged to have been suffered in said collision by the owner of said derrick Capitol by reason of damages to said derrick, may be submitted to the United States court for the eastern district of New York under and in compliance with the rules of said court sitting as a court of admiralty; and that the said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole controversy and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of the legal damages sustained by reason of said collision, if any shall be found to be due either for or against the United States, upon the same principle and measure of liability, with costs, as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, with the same right of appeal.

SEC. 2. That should damages be found to be due from the United States to the owner of said derrick Capitol, the amount of the final decree or decrees therefor shall be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That such suit shall be brought and commenced within four months after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That the mode of service of process shall conform to the provision of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the United States."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE DERRICK "CONCORD."

The bill (S. 3294) for the relief of the owner of the derrick Concord, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I desire to say that we have now reached on the calendar a series of House bills which have as their only purpose the authorization of suits. There are no amounts of money appropriated by them. Unless the Senator feels strongly about it, I hope we may get these bills off the calendar. Senate bill 3294, the title of which has just been read, has for its sole purpose the authorization of a suit. Certainly the people involved are entitled to their day in court to determine whether or not they have any claim, and if they have, what it is.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Missouri that I have not had time to read the bill, but, as I understand, the bill is for the purpose of enabling some person to sue the Government?

Mr. SPENCER. That is all. In other words, there was a collision between the boat of the claimant and a Government boat. The department is in favor of the adjudication of the claim; and the question is, Where is the right? The object of this bill is to authorize a suit for the purpose of determining that right.

Mr. KING. Did the committee make an investigation in order to ascertain whether or not there was negligence on the part of the Government?

Mr. SPENCER. Yes. The Navy Department made an investigation of the facts of the case and filed their report recommending the very procedure which is provided for in the bill.

Mr. KING. Did the department confess that there was negligence on the part of the naval officers?

Mr. SPENCER. They did; and the report is here. It is only in cases where the department recommend that the matter be referred to the Court of Claims that such action is recommended by the committee.

Mr. KING. I should like to say to the Senator from Missouri that we have had a number of cases here in which the Navy Department has confessed the negligence of its officers; in some instances, as I recall, the evidence showed gross negligence. I was wondering whether in these cases the committee had made any investigation in order to determine whether or not the officers in charge of the vessels, those who were responsible for the collisions, had been called upon by the Government to reimburse the United States for the amounts which it had been compelled to pay.

Mr. SPENCER. I desire to say to the Senator from Utah that I inadvertently made a misstatement in reference to this matter.

There are two classes of cases that come to us from the department. One of them is where, after investigation, the department is clearly of the opinion that the Government is liable. In such a case they recommend an appropriation. This is not one of those cases. This is a case where the Navy Department made their examination, and while they are not perfectly satisfied as to the merits of the claim, they do report that the circumstances are such as to entitle the claimant to have his case adjudicated. They recommend, therefore, the procedure provided for in the bill. This bill is one of the latter cases. We have, however, had some of the former.

Mr. KING. Did the Senator or the committee make such an investigation as led them to believe that the Government ought to compensate the claimant for the damages which he has demanded?

Mr. SPENCER. I have tried to make the matter clear. The Navy Department did not make such an examination as led them to the clear conclusion that the Government ought now to pay the amount, but they did come to the conclusion that the circumstances were such that the claimants had a right to have their claims adjudicated by a court, and so recommended. That is what this bill is designed to accomplish.

Mr. KING. My question was whether the committee of the Senate of which the Senator from Missouri is chairman had made any investigation?

Mr. SPENCER. The committee carefully looked into the facts and concurred in the conclusion of the Navy Department as the result of the examination which they made, to the effect that the facts constituted a case which entitled the claimant to have his claim adjudicaed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind Senators that we are proceeding under the five-minute rule, which permits a Senator to speak once, and then only for five minutes. The Senator's time has about expired.

Mr. KING. I understand the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. I object.

STEAMSHIP "URUBAMBRA."

The bill (S. 3518) for the relief of the owner of the steamship Urubambra was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the owner of the steamship Urubambra arising out of collision between said steamboat and the U. S. S. West Carnifax on February 14, 1919, in the Panama Canal, for and on account of the losses alleged to have been suffered in said collision by the owner of said steamship Urubambra by reason of damages to said steamship, may be submitted to the United States court for the southern or eastern district of New York, under and in compliance with the rules of said court sitting as a court of admiralty; and that the said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole controversy and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of the legal damages sustained by reason of said collision, if any shall be found to be due either for or against the United States, upon the same principle and measure of liability, with costs, as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, with the same right of appeal.

SEC. 2. That should damages be found to be due from the United States to the owner of said steamship Urubambra amount of the final decree or decrees therefor shall be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That such suit shall be brought and commenced within four months after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That the mode of service of process shall conform to the provision of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the United States."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELLEN AGNES MONOGUE.

The bill (H. R. 909) for the relief of Ellen Agnes Monogue was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill; indeed, from what little I know about the bill I should think it ought to pass. I was wondering, however, what basis the committee adopted in determining the amount to be awarded.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, this is another one of those cases where no amount is definitely determined. This case is differentiated from the other by the fact that this bill has passed the House.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator, I think, is discussing the wrong bill.

Mr. SPENCER. This is calendar No. 346, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The calendar number of the bill is 346.

Mr. SPENCER. The bill passed the House after the House committee had examined it and reported favorably upon it. It came to us with that recommendation. The pending bill and the next following four bills are House bills. The committee examined into the facts, and believed, as I have already stated, that the claimant had a right to have her day in court on the facts in the case.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator lays considerable stress upon the fact that these bills have passed the House, and, therefore, they should be passed by the Senate. The Senator is chairman of the Committee on Claims, and I wish to call his attention to the fact now that he will find very few Senate bills reported by his committee and passed by this body which will be acted upon favorably by the Claims Committee of the House. We pass bills in the Senate; they go to the other House, and there they die session after session. I do not see that we are under any obligation whatever to pass House bills in preference to Senate bills.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I will say that I was wrong in my statement that this bill was an authorization. This bill is not an authorization, but is a House bill calling for a direct appropriation. The authorization bills follow.

Mr. SMOOT. My colleague [Mr. KING] asked the Senator upon what basis the amount of $2,500, appropriated by the bill, was arrived at. I was quite sure the Senator was wrong when he made the statement in the beginning that the bill carried no appropriation, because he certainly would have seen that a direct appropriation is made if he had noticed the bill.

Mr. SPENCER. The facts in the case are that the Government was transporting an insane man, and the inspectors, experiencing difficulty, called upon a local policeman to assist them. The local policeman put himself under their orders and helped them, and while they were taking care of the insane man he killed the policeman. This is a bill for the reimbursement of his widow, in an amount, as the committee went through it, of approximately a year's salary. The amount has been cut down, I think, to $2,500. Those are the facts in the case, but what the Senator wants to do is for the Senate to decide.

Mr. SMOOT. As the House passed the bill, it carried $2,500.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES A. SHOWEN.

The bill (H. R. 946) for the relief of James A. Showen was considered as in Committee on the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT T. LEGGE.

The bill (H. R. 1317) for the relief of Robert T. Legge was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $150 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to pay to Robert T. Legge, a citizen of McCloud, Shasta County, in the State of California, compensation for professional operation performed on John Moran, who was injured while an employee of the United States Forest Service.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, do I understand that this bill carries an appropriation of $150 to pay somebody who performed an operation on an employee of the Government?

Mr. SPENCER. No; this man was an employee of the Government in the Forest Service. He was injured in the performance of his duty. The accident was occasioned before the compensation act went into effect, and he was taken to a hospital and this operation was performed. The Department of Agriculture reported that in their judgment the bill was not only a reasonable one but ought to be paid, and the committee came to the same conclusion.

Mr. SMOOT. The reason why I have made any inquiry about it is because of the fact that I know of cases where items of this kind have been taken care of by the Secretary of the Interior, particularly on reclamation projects, and I was wondering why we had a bill here appropriating money for professional services rendered an employee of the Govenment. It is rather out of the ordinary procedure.

Mr. SPENCER. I should say so. The reason of it was because of the emergency character of the injury, which broke the man's hip and necessitated immediate surgical treatment.

Mr. SMOOT. That happens wherever there is a similar accident, or anything of a character that requires immediate attention. What I was complaining of was that a bill of this kind should come here at all. I can not see why it should, if the department has advanced all that it thought was necessary and all that it thought was right in behalf of this employee.

I am not going to object to this $150 payment, and I only spoke of the matter at this time because if the department has been paying this man his salary right along during the time he was incapacitated because of this operation, or given any advance to him, and it has been used in some other way, and the advance to this employee has been all that the department thinks he ought to have, then I think this kind of a bill should not be here.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator is quite right. The difference between the state of facts which the Senator outlines and this is that the man was carried to a hospital in the emergency, and he himself had to pay for the expenses of the hospital out of the daily wage that the Government paid him for some months because of this accident. In view of the fact that the accident occurred in the Government service, and from an overloaded truck, the Government ought to pay for the hospital attendance; so I think the Senator is quite right, but we are probably paying more than $150 by our discussion of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). If there be no amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BALTIMORE DRY DOCKS & SHIPBUILDING CO.

The bill (H. R. 1865) for the relief of the Baltimore Dry Docks & Shipbuilding Co., owner of a dry dock at Baltimore, Md., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, is this a direct appropriation or is it an authorization to go to court?

Mr. SPENCER. These are the two bills to which I referred as merely giving authority for the bringing of suits—this bill and the next one.

Mr. SMOOT. Is not the Senator wrong in that? I notice, in hurriedly reading the proviso, that it says:

That should damages be found to be due from the United States to the owner of said dry dock, the amount of the final decree or decrees therefor shall be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

It seems to go further than the mere fact of allowing the company to go to court.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I suggest that that language ought to be stricken out. I do not think it has been customary for us to appropriate in this way, and the Senator can see in a moment what it might mean. We do not know. It might involve several million dollars.

Mr. SMOOT. We can not tell anything about it.

Mr. NORRIS. It has been customary to send a matter of this kind to the Court of Claims and let the Court of Claims report, and then an appropriation is made to pay the amount found by the court.

Mr. SMOOT. That has always been the practice.

Mr. NORRIS. If this bill goes further than that the Senate ought to amend it.

Mr. SPENCER. I have not a copy of the bill before me, but I do not think it went that far as it came from our committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The proviso referred to by the Senator from Utah will be found on page 2, lines 7 to 12.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I move to strike out the proviso on page 2, beginning at the end of line 7 with the word "Pro- vided," and going to and including the word "appropriated" on line 12; also the word "And" following the word "appropriated," so that it will read "Provided further."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EASTERN TRANSPORTATION COMPANY.

The bill (H. R. 5346) for the relief of the Eastern Transportation Co., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1003) for the relief of Jesse L. Clay, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

KNY-SCHEERER CORPORATION.

The bill (S. 175) for the relief of Kny-Scheerer Corporation, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the Kny-Scheerer Corporation, of New York City, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $148.77, the same being amount of claim against the Department of the Interior, for additional freight charges on the shipment of certain surgical supplies to the Indian agency at Wellpinit, Wash., which were erroneously omitted from said corporation's invoice for goods and freight charges thereon, claim for which has been disallowed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2292) for the relief of the William Gordon Corporation, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3792) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the United States Army, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. NORRIS. Let that go over.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator objected.

Mr. NORRIS. I make the objection because I think it is perfectly apparent that we can not consider a bill of that importance under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

SUFFERERS FROM MEXICAN DEPREDATIONS.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 80) to correct an error in the wording of the appropriation of $71,000, made in the act approved July 9, 1918, and to authorize the Secretary of War to pay said sum to respective parties entitled thereto, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether this joint resolution increases the appropriation or any obligation whatever of the Government?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, though I am not the chairman of the committee, I am familiar with the joint resolution, and I will say that it does not increase the appropriation at all.

Mr. KING. What is the object of the legislation?

Mr. SHEPPARD. To remunerate certain American citizens for damages incurred from bullets that came over the international line at Juarez during the Battle of Juarez. A commission was appointed and looked into the matter thoroughly and concluded that the American Government was liable to the American citizens injured, but the joint resolution which provided payment failed to include damages on account of those wounded, while it did include payment to the relatives of those who were killed.

Mr. SMOOT. It is one of those joint resolutions that was never to cost anything.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the joint resolution will be reported to the Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas said that the joint resolution did not increase the amount of $71,000.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is my understanding.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not had time to read the report. I presume the statement of the Senator is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is in the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the committee who have been making this investigation why, if the Government is paying persons who suffer from Mexican depredations, it exhibits such a fine sense of discrimination? There are thousands of persons who have suffered damage at the hands of Mexican nationals, and in many instances the injuries to which they have been subjected go back 10 or 15 years.

Why so much solicitude for a few individuals who have recently suffered, when there are thousands who have suffered and are now without homes or means of support, who have been driven from Mexico and receive no consideration whatever at the hands of the Mexican Government or the Government of the United States? Has any policy been adopted by the committee under which certain ones are to be favored and certain others who have been damaged are to be ignored?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not think the Senator ought to address an inquiry of that sort to the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate. He could get the correct information by going to the State Department and the White House.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is one thing about the joint resolution to which I think the attention of the Senator ought to be called. I notice that Silesia Griffiths is granted $15,000 on account of the death of her husband by gunshot wound.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I hope Senators will not take up the time debating. It is pretty near 2 o'clock now, and I would like to have the next bill on the calendar taken up, to which I think there is no objection. I will ask the Senator from Utah if he will not let that be taken up?

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to taking up the bill.

I want to ask the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] why it is that in this claim there is $15,000 given to Silesia Griffiths on account of the death of her husband by gunshot wounds.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The report of the commission goes into the matter specifically. I ask that the joint resolution may go over, so that the Senator from Utah may have an opportunity to examine the report.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I want to be heard a moment. I hope the joint resolution will not go over. I shall take only a moment, and I am sure that I can convince Senators why the bill should pass. I ask the particular attention of the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the statement, because he asked about the matter.

The battle between the two contending Mexican forces out of which these claims grew was in 1910. These are the oldest claims.

In August, 1912, the Congress of the United States passed a joint resolution directing the War Department to assemble a board of Army officers of large experience to investigate and report to Congress what claims should be paid. The board did assemble, and I think then Maj. Francis J. Kernan, now Gen. Francis J. Kernan, was at the head of the board. Elaborate testimony was taken. The board met in San Diego, in Phoenix, in El Paso, and elsewhere. The claims of all persons who were not citizens of the United States were rejected.

It was discovered that the sum of $71,000 would be a fair sum of money to compensate the personal representatives of those American citizens who, standing on our soil, were killed by bullets from the contending factions, fired across the line; that $71,000 would be a proper sum to pay to personal representatives of deceased persons and to pay the injured.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] subsequently introduced and had passed a joint resolution appropriating the money which the board recommended, $71,000, but by error, purely a typographical error, the word "injured" was left out. The money has been appropriated, and this is simply to correct the legislation so that those who were injured, as well as the personal representatives of those who were killed, can get the money. That is all there is to it. It is to correct an error and to pay those who were among the first to be injured.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the principle of the joint resolution, but I do believe that we ought to have some consistency when appropriating money for either death or injury, whether for employees of the Government or not. Mr. President, there are two parties who will draw $15,000 each for the death of a relative. I find that Joseph W. Harrington, for the death of his brother by gunshot wound, will draw $15,000. I want to say to the Senator, with all due respect, that I do not remember a bill ever having passed the Senate carrying $15,000 for the death of a brother.

Mr. ASHURST. Let me say to the Senator that the personal representatives of those who were killed have all had the money, and this is only now to permit the joint resolution to be corrected so that those who were injured may get the sum of money which the board assembled by the War Department found to be due.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the time now is too short to read the report or to read the joint resolution, and I want to ask at this time that it go over and I will look up the details.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It was for that purpose that I asked that it go over, so that the Senator from Utah might examine the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). The joint resolution will be passed over.

INVENTIONS, PATENTS, AND PATENT RIGHTS.

The bill (S. 3223) authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to accept and administer for the benefit of the public and the encouragement of industry, inventions, patents, and patent rights, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NORRIS. The bill has heretofore been read.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill has been read, and when it was up before I objected to its consideration, with a view to striking out the words "the Federal Trade Commission" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "Secretary of the Interior." Representatives of the Bureau of Mines and other officials of the department have called upon me begging that the bill be allowed to pass as it is. I do not know whether any good will come from it or not. There may, and if there is, everyone will be perfectly satisfied with its passage.

If no advantage is taken of it, of course, the law can be repealed. But that is one thing that never happens in the history of legislation, as far as Congress is concerned. We have on the statute books to-day acts passed by Congress the existence of which I do not believe is known by more than one or two Members of the House and very few in the Senate, and the acts carry with them every year hundreds of millions of dollars of appropriations, about which no investigation is made and no discussion ever brought before this body. We appropriate the money here to meet the situation as it existed 25 or 30 or 40 years ago, and no one knows how the money is spent nor where it goes, and it does not seem to be anybody's business to investigate. I am speaking of the permanent appropriations made by Congress. I think, Mr. President, there can be cut out of those permanent appropriations $200,000,000 every year, and just as soon as I can get the investigation completed and go into those appropriations I am going to call the attention of the Senate to them and see if we really want to save money in our appropriations hereafter.

So, Mr. President, I have concluded that I shall not object to the passage of the pending bill at this time, and I only want to express the hope that some good will come from it. I can see, of course, as a result of its passage, the building up here of a new bureau, and the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars; but I am in hopes that hereafter those things will cease, and that a little more attention will be paid to the increase that is asked for just such creations as the bill carries.

Mr. THOMAS. Let the bill be read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). The bill will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Patents with amendments, on page 1, line 5, before the word "under," to insert the words "or other rights or powers"; and on page 2, lines 20 to 24, strike out section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the appropriations of any governmental department, bureau, office, or establishment are hereby made available for the payment of fees charged by the Patent Office for and in connection with the granting of patents contemplated by this act.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 3. That the Commissioner of Patents is hereby directed to grant all patents and record all assignments and licenses contemplated by this act without the payment of any fee—

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Federal Trade Commission be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered to accept assignment of, or license or other rights or powers under, to develop, to issue or refuse to issue licenses under, to encourage the industrial use and application of, and otherwise to administer, on behalf of the United States, under such regulations and in such manner as the President shall prescribe, inventions, patents, and patent rights which said commission deems it to the advantage of the public to be so accepted, as these may from time to time be tendered it by employees of the various departments or other establishments of the Government, or by other individuals or agencies; and to cooperate, as necessity may arise, with scientific or other agencies of the Government in the discharge of the duties herein set out.

SEC. 2. That the Federal Trade Commission be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to collect fees and royalties for licensing said inventions, patents, and patent rights in such amounts and in such manner as the President shall direct, and shall deposit the same with the Treasurer of the United States; and of the total amount of such fees and royalties so deposited a certain per cent, to be determined by the President, shall be reserved, set aside, and appropriated as a special fund to be disbursed as directed by the President to remunerate inventors for such of their inventions, patents, and patent rights contemplated by this act as may prove meritorious and of public benefit.

SEC. 3. That the Commissioner of Patents is hereby directed to grant all patents and record all assignments and licenses contemplated by this act without the payment of any fee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OSCAR C. GUESSAZ.

The bill (S. 557) for the relief of Oscar C. Guessaz was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ANNA M. TOBIN.

The bill (S. 1533) for the relief of Anna M. Tobin, independent executrix of the estate of Frank R. Tobin, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 4, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$2,233.60" and to insert "$1,500," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,500 to be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to Anna M. Tobin, independent executrix of the estate of Frank R. Tobin, deceased, for damages to said estate by soldiers of the United States Army in 1916 and 1917 near El Paso, Tex.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY SUPPLY BASES.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 151) to permit the payment for certain lands whereon Army supply bases are situated was announced as next in order, and was read.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri to explain the joint resolution.

Mr. SPENCER. I can explain it, Mr. President, very easily. Congress appropriated in the Sixty-fifth Congress $147,000,000 for Army supply bases. The War Department went ahead and built those Army supply bases. At the six points mentioned in this joint resolution the ground upon which these buildings were erected has not been fully paid for. There were two of them, Charleston and Boston, which the committee cut out, the Boston base calling for $2,000,000 and the Charleston base calling for $600,000.

The other features of the joint resolution, which calls for about $5,000,000, are for payment of land upon which the Government has already expended $136,000,000, and the buildings are upon this land.

Mr. SMOOT. The hour of 2 o'clock is near, and we had better let the joint resolution go over.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Do I understand that the Senator from Utah objects?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; we can not pass it now.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I simply want to say that this joint resolution provides for the payment by the Government for land where the money is owed, and the Government, I think, should pay its just debts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is objection, and the joint resolution will be passed over.

CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes.

Mr. FRANCE obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Will the Senator from Maryland be kind enough to yield for just a minute or two in order that I may ask unanimous consent to bring up a bill? It will not lead to debate, but if it does I will say to the Senator that I shall not press it at this time.

Mr. FRANCE. I could not yield the floor, and I am very anxious that the bill which is the unfinished business shall be acted upon.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It will take just a minute or two. It is a unanimous report of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator from Maryland yields, the unfinished business is before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent another measure might be considered, the Chair will state.

Mr. STERLING. Oh, certainly.

Mr. FRANCE. I feel that I can not give consent, in view of the fact that I am very much interested myself in the retirement bill and I wish to see it advanced as speedily as possible. If the Senator will allow me, I should much prefer to proceed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Of course, I ought to accede to the wishes of the Senator in the matter, but it would require only a minute or two to dispose of the bill to which I have referred.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator from Maryland has the floor.

RESTORATION OF AMERICAN LIBERTY.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I will proceed with what I have to say. I gave notice a few days ago that I would take this occasion to submit some observations on a subject which I choose to call the Restoration of American liberty.

February contains two days which set that month apart from all the rest. Its 12th day is fragrant with the memories of the immortal Lincoln—seer, prophet, emancipator of a race, and martyr in the cause of liberty; while on the 22d day we celebrate the coming to the flesh and to the affairs of earth of the pure and majestic spirit of our Washington, who was divinely destined to liberate a people, create from weak and discordant Colonies a Nation, and to enunciate and demonstrate the applicability of those great principles of liberty which he believed were first to find complete expression here and later an ever-widening application by the establishment of free governments throughout the world.

As during the recent weeks my thoughts have turned to the great principles of liberty declared by Washington, by the fathers, and by Lincoln, as I have witnessed the solemn deliberations of the Senate over the proposed iniquitous and destructive treaty, and as I have reviewed the legislative record of the Congress, since I became a Member of this body, seeking to measure the wisdom of our actions by the high standards which they fixed for us, I have been most reluctantly forced to the conclusion that, judged by their exalted ideals, we have not proved worthy of the charge intrusted to us; that we have failed to keep the faith.

THE FAILURE OF PARTIES.

Political parties may not be judged by the gleaming generalities of their orators, by policies promised, or by formulated platforms. Their characters must be known from an examination of the principles wrought by them into the fabric of enacted law and by the manner of the enforcement of the laws by their executive officers. Sirs, nominally there exist to-day in the United States two great political parties, which were formed around issues long since obsolete, and in a few months these two parties will put forward rival candidates who will seek election to the highest of offices, each of the parties contending for the election of its candidate because of some peculiar virtue residing in itself. These two great parties have had in the years past an inspiring history of services rendered to the Republic, under the leadership of indomitable statesmen. But if we are candid—and the time has arrived when candor has become a necessity—we must admit that, judged by their legislative records in the Congress during the last three years, so far as concerns their ability to represent and to defend vital American principles, both of these two great parties are as decadent as the issues which first quickened them into being. They hold their noble names, but they have become apostate from the great principles and policies which they once advanced and so valiantly defended. If they are to be judged, I say, only by their legislative records as separate party entities, we must behold their barren frames like the whitening bones or empty salt sea shells which remain as melancholy monuments of departed life and of germinative and formative principles which are no longer operative.

In a great national emergency, when the very nature, quality, and the possibility of the perpetuity of free institutions were being assayed in the fierce fires and white-hot crucibles of war, neither one of these great political organizations, judged by the actions of their representatives in the Congress, could stand the supreme test. In saying this I am not speaking of individuals, nor am I forgetting the faithful, unwearying, and distinguished services of many, indeed of the vast majority, of the Members of the Congress, but I am speaking of the parties, as political organizations, which are supposed to represent separate and distinct policies, all of which should be based upon the deep-lying principles upon which rest the foundations of the Republic. The Democratic Party, under an autocratic leadership, ingloriously abandoned the essentially sound and valuable doctrine of the dignity and the sovereignty of the States, became apostate from the principles of the noble Jeffersonian democracy, and voted without scruple huge powers, legislative, executive, and judicial, to the Chief Executive, who was, in violation of the Constitution and of every cherished principle of liberty, created the most powerful despot in all the world. The Republican Party, which sprang from the minds of the wise constitutionalists, Washington, Hamilton, and Lincoln, the party which had hitherto stood steadfast, even through the flames and bloody agony of civil war, in defense of the Constitution of our country, the party which had been at once the party of liberty and progress through all the years, joined with the Bourbon reactionaries and connived in the setting up of this autocracy, which has been an utter repudiation of government by constitution and by law, a repudiation of every principle of the Republic.

BOURBONISM HAS PREVAILED.

Against the better judgment, I must believe, of the majority of the Members of the Congress, the Members having yielded through patriotic motives their judgment to another, not the principles of Jefferson's democracy, not the principles of Hamilton's federalism, not the principles of Lincoln's constitutionalism, not the principles of Roosevelt's Americanism, but the stupid policies of blind and reactionary Bourbonism have prevailed when there arose the question of the preservation during war of the inherent natural rights and personal liberties of the sovereign people of the Republic. In this there has been a misrepresentation of the sentiments of the American people in the Congress. Bourbonism is not Americanism, and all of the foolish efforts of the reactionaries to create the new American crime of radicalism are doomed to failure. Our great Americans have always been political radicals, and this Republic has always been the great radical among the nations. He is not imbued with the true American spirit who fears political experimentation, who dreads the wide spaces and the free air of full and fearless public discussion, and who would dwell cabined and confined within the high-walled valleys of conservatism instead of boldly mounting the heights from which can be caught some vision of a more efficient and beneficent and more comprehensive application of the principles of liberty.

In every organism there must be portions making for stability and permanency and the vital parts in which reside capacity for change and growth. In the root and rhizome there must be the fiber and rigidity as a foundation for the uplifted plant, as well as a sensitive and responsive growing point, mysterious and complex beyond analysis, at which and through which the everlasting principles and processes of life find new expression and expanding opportunity. So is it with the world and its political institutions; there must be the stabilizing power of precedent, tradition, custom, and devotion to old principles, but there must also be an ever new translation of the principles of liberty and cooperation into terms of the present needs of the social and economic order. In Europe and in the Orient there were until recent days that political stability and rigidity which resisted all change. Even where governments were outwardly transformed their spirits remained unaltered. The hard encrusted institutions of feudalism, of class, of caste, of dignity, and rank were refractory beyond the dissolving power of the new democracy. The spirit of feudalism flourished and all its practices survived its fortresses and crumbling castles. It was clear that only upon fresh soil could there be established those new, free, and democratic institutions which should constitute the point of political growth and experimentation in the world. Our Nation was, I believe, destined to be the pioneer, pointing the forward path to all other peoples. This does not mean a continual striving to discover new political principles, for there are no new political principles. But it does mean that we must be unresting in seeking to bring about radical changes for the better by conservative means, by the new and more complete application of old principles to meet new and changed conditions. Our fathers placed their hands and ours to the plow of the Republic and we may neither look backward nor halt, for we must press ever forward down the long furrows which shall prepare the fallow ground for the bringing forth of those new and better political institutions which shall insure a larger emancipation of our people and a wider dissemination through the years of liberty to all men everywhere. Bourbonism and reaction, and not radicalism and reformation, are the crimes which are out of harmony with the great expanding, liberty-loving, progressive American spirit.

A NATIONAL CRISIS.

We face a grave national crisis. By the decision which we shall reach concerning international relationships, and by our next national election, we shall determine whether we shall rush recklessly on upon our present course to the unknown and uncomputed perils of a continued disregard for principles, for the Constitution, and for laws; whether we shall adopt political opportunism as a permanent policy; whether we shall accept that sinister philosophy that the end justifies the means; or whether we shall turn with loathing from these political husks, fit only for the swine, and go back to our home, back to the faith of our fathers, back to the reacceptance and a reaffirmation of the great principles of liberty which, so long as they be not disregarded by the people, by the legislatures, and by the courts, will insure to ourselves and to our sons and, with the passage of the years, to all men everywhere, the unspeakable blessings of freedom.

COOPERATION FOR LIBERTY.

Governments are organisms. Their forms and spirits change in obedience to established law and by the orderly processes of evolution. The first form of government was a community, a combination for defense; the second, the empire, an association for aggression and exploitation; the third, the last, and the highest type, our own Nation, the Republic, a cooperation for liberty. Through all the course of history we perceive these ascending purposes—the first purpose, self-preservation; the second, selfish imperial assertion; and now the purpose of our institutions, liberation. Our Government is the only one in all the world founded upon the positive affirmation of this great purpose of liberation. We can make no common cause with other nations unless they unconditionally accept this highest of all purposes, to which our Nation has been dedicated. The essential nature of our Government being cooperation for liberty, we can not become organically associated with other governments of lesser purposes and different nature from our own. During the war, and now as a result of the war, there has been a wide departure from our best ideals and highest purposes. Class conflict for advantage, competition over mere money compensation, reaction, reveling in repression, intolerance leading to oppression, have been predominant over the great American spirit and purpose of cooperation for liberty.

RESTORATION OF LIBERTY.

The practical and immediate question is, How shall we revive the spirit of Americanism, of toleration, of cooperation, and by what practical means shall we secure that wider application of liberty which shall make our ideals incorporate and vital in every department and part of our national life? How shall we rekindle the flame of the love of liberty on the altar of every American heart, and how shall we carry to every citizen a liberty more complete, which means an equal and ever-enlarging opportunity for expansion, self-determination, and self-cultivation? How shall we carry into the international councils most effectively our great national affirmation and assertion of the principles of liberty, in order that liberation and self-determination may displace throughout the world exploitation and oppression? There is but one issue—liberty! The battle is on, and before many weeks have passed our opportunists and political "pussy footers" will find that they must take a stand for or against the restoration of our liberty.

There must be a restoration of our liberty. We must go back before we can go onward—back to regain the great liberty which we enjoyed before the war, and then forward to a greater liberty. The unavoidable issue now is liberty; how to secure the liberty the world has sought through all the centuries, the liberty which seers have seen and poets have sung and for which immortal martyrs have sacrificed their all; the liberty that we were told that in this war we fought for, but which we have forfeited; the liberty which we have known, have loved, and have lost—political liberty, personal liberty, liberty of opinion, liberty of action, liberty of expression, self-responsibility, and self-determination—the liberty which we have declared to all the world and which we would gladly share with all of those who are oppressed. If the Republican Party, the party of Lincoln, the liberator, shall not now become the party of liberalism and of liberty, if it will not again announce that in all the world there is no issue which compares with the securing and the widest application of liberty, then there must arise a new and liberal party which shall express the aspirations of the millions of America who now demand the restoration of their liberty and of their liberties.

As briefly as I may, I shall attempt to formulate what I believe to be some of the sentiments and the most important demands of that great and growing group of men who might be called Republican Liberals, because they are at once devoted to the principles of the Republic and to the cause of liberalism. I have presumed on previous occasions to discuss some of these matters to which in the course of my present remarks I can only refer.

BACK TO THE REPUBLIC.

We demand that there shall be a clear and definite reacceptance and reaffirmation of a faith in the principles of the Republic, as established by the fathers, with its three separate, independent, and coordinate branches, legislative, executive, and judicial, the form of government which preserves liberty by a division of authority, preventing that consolidation of powers in one office or official which constitutes true despotism.

LET LEGISLATORS LEGISLATE.

We condemn, as tending to subvert our Government, the vicious practice by which legislation has been drafted in the executive departments and then forced by means of threats, intimidation, or other methods of coercion by the executive upon the legislative branch of the Government which should represent the people. We hold that in a free government legislation must originate with and arise from the people rather than with a powerful and perhaps autocratic Executive, to be imposed, through the power of patronage or by force, upon the people.

CURB EXECUTIVE POWER.

We contemplate, with a deep concern for the safety of our country and a high determination and resolve to resist it to the uttermost, the recent enormous growth of Executive power, tending toward tyranny. We pledge ourselves to oppose the election to high office of any man, of whatever party, who would advocate measures the tendency of which would be to enhance or to buttress Executive authority.

REPEAL AUTOCRATIC STATUTES.

We demand the careful study and revision or repeal of all statutes which have lodged with executive officials large discretionary powers, and further demand the immediate termination of personal and arbitrary government, government by commissions issuing edicts and promulgating regulations, as distinguished from government by clear and definite statutes enacted by the Congress under powers clearly granted by our Constitution; statutes in harmony with the letter and spirit of our institutions, to be enforced impartially against all offenders, rich and poor, alike.

FAIR ENFORCEMENT OF LAW.

We demand the fair and equal enforcement of the law without respect to social circumstances, section, race, or color, and hold that it would be intolerable to have Federal spies, agents, and officers hounding men for mere words spoken, or for violating statutes to carry out the eighteenth amendment in some States, while acts of violence, lynching, murder, resistance of officers of the law and violations of the fifteenth amendment are permitted with impunity in other States. We demand a constructive policy with reference to the race question, believing it to be both immoral and inexpedient to continue a system which is designed to keep the colored people of certain portions of our country in a condition of ignorance, poverty, and degradation, and we hold that to extend to these people, to whom we are under heavy obligations and for whom we have assumed the responsibility, larger opportunities for industrial, vocational, and general education, would be most advantageous.

END SPY SYSTEM.

We demand an end to the taxing of the people for the payment of swarms of Federal spies, agents, and special officers, who may become parasites, blackmailers, sappers of political morality, and a menace to liberty.

REORGANIZATION OF EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Believing that the high cost of government is a most important factor in causing the high cost of living, we demand economy and efficiency in all governmental departments as a step in the direction of a rehabilitation of our national finances. But we hold that economy and efficiency can not be secured without a thorough, drastic reorganization of the executive departments, with such a retrenchment in expenditures as is not now contemplated. In the executive branch of the Government the reduplication of work, competition and conflicts between departments, bureaus, and divisions, the overlapping of functions, and the unscientific divisions of authority are not only preventing prompt executive action but they are enormously increasing that extravagance and waste in every direction which are becoming so notorious and scandalous. This deplorable lack of a rational organization of the executive branch of the Government was aggravated by the war, and it has resulted during the last three years in the wastage of many millions of dollars of the people's money. Our vast lump-sum appropriations, the making of which is a vicious practice, tending toward wastage and the augmentation of executive power, have brought about further demoralization in the executive departments. The Overman bill, granting to the President the power to reorganize the executive departments, has, so far as we know, remained a dead letter, and, in the absence of vigorous and capable executive direction, conditions in the executive departments have for several years steadily been growing more unsatisfactory.

A BUDGET SYSTEM.

We demand at the earliest possible moment the enactment of legislation providing for a rational national budget system, by which we may know in advance what the needs of the Government will be, what might be eliminated, and what must be provided for. The proper measures for the reorganization of the executive branch of the Government and for a budget system are indispensable and inseparable. There can be no application of business principles to the appropriation of funds until there shall be at the same time this reorganization of the agencies through which these funds are to be expended and applied.

RESTORATION OF FREE SPEECH.

We hold it to be an elemental and self-evident truth that there can be no free government without practical and absolute freedom of speech, an uninfluenced and unfettered press, and the unabridged right of the people to assemble to petition for a redress of their grievances. We demand the immediate restoration of these rights, the repeal of the unconstitutional and tyrannical espionage act, and a recommendation of amnesty for all political prisoners held under this Federal statute only for political opinions held or for words spoken or written, as distinguished from direct incitation to violence, acts of violence, or overt acts against the Government. You have condemned bolshevism for its confiscation of real and personal property, but that is a worse form of bolshevism which confiscates real and personal rights. Confiscation of real and personal property affects the few, but the confiscation of real and personal liberty impoverishes all.

AMENDING AND DESTROYING THE CONSTITUTION.

Let us not be deceived. Democracy can not insure liberty. The tyranny of the majority can be as terrible as the tyranny of the minority. Democracy unrestrained can be as cruel as autocracy absolute. Cooperation for liberty must be secured not by democracy, formless, disorganized, and disorderly, but by the Republic, with its Constitution, with its protecting mandates, setting the absolute metes and bounds beyond which even the majority may not go in the invasion of the inalienable, inherent, natural rights of the minority. There is but one test of loyalty which may be applied: Is the man loyal to this Constitution of his country, and does he feel a whole-hearted love and devotion for the institutions of liberty which it creates and insures? Judged by this test, I fear that there may languish to-day in Federal prisons true patriots and that there may be sitting in legislative halls men with disloyal and traitorous hearts.

Because the Constitution guarantees us liberty there can be no question approaching in importance the question as to the method by which the Constitution shall be amended. This question is squarely raised in connection with the methods adopted for the securing of the eighteenth amendment. The question as to whether men shall be temperate is an important one, but it is not so important as the question whether men shall be free. If it can be successfully contended that the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution was fairly, legally, and constitutionally adopted, then it must be admitted that in spite of the wisdom of the fathers, which formulated such careful plans for the preservation of the Constitution, a means has now been found by which it may be destroyed.

By the same methods which were used to secure the eighteenth amendment, there might easily have been secured an amendment to strike out the first amendment to the Constitution or the whole Bill of Rights. I shall not discuss the question of the wisdom of writing into our fundamental law such provisions as are contained in the eighteenth amendment. I, who have always advocated legislation for the application of temperance by the principle of local option, believe that this amendment is out of harmony with the whole spirit and nature of the Federal Constitution, the purpose of which, I say, was to affirm and preserve our natural rights and not to carry legislation or limit the sovereign people's legislative powers. The fathers purposely devised the plan designed to make the amending of the Constitution difficult. They realized the danger of undertaking to legislate by constitutional amendment. They foresaw the destructive results which might follow if the Constitution were not safeguarded against the possibility of sudden changes which might, without proper safeguards, be made in times of public excitement. The method of amendment provides ample protection for normal times, for ordinary circumstances and perhaps under all conditions when all of the provisions of the Constitution were being scrupulously regarded and all of its affirmations and reservations fully operative. This was not the case during the war when the eighteenth amendment was adopted. There were men upon this floor who contended that during the war time the Constitution might be suspended and its provisions disregarded, a view untenable, and yet one which materially influenced our legislative action. The Constitution provides in its fifth article the method for its amendment. The provisions of this article are to the effect, as I understand them, that when two-thirds of all of the representatives of the several States in Congress shall deem it necessary to do so, they may submit an amendment which must be ratified by three-fourths of the several States. This is but an outline of the method, for it must be remembered that republican representative government is government by discussion and, not only from the whole nature of the Constitution, but from the specific provisions of the first amendment, it is to be presumed that, prior to the making of a motion for the submission of an amendment, during the debate upon the question of submission, in the State conventions or in the Congress, and during the whole pendency of the amendment before the States for ratification, there would be taking place that full, free, fearless, and unrestrained public discussion which would bring to light all of the questions involved in such an important step and which would afford every individual whose interests might be affected every possible opportunity for making his voice or protests heard. Can any candid and honest man contend that there was such government by public discussion and by freely expressed opinion during the war? If there is such, he would do well to review the history of the three years past.

On the 15th day of June, 1917, the espionage act became a law. This drastic measure was reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee, a committee dominated by ardent advocates of national prohibition. This committee had also favorably reported on June 11, 1917, the resolution for the submission of the eighteenth amendment, and on December 18, 1917, after very little debate or public discussion, this resolution for the submission of the amendment was passed by the Congress, and the question was thus submitted for discussion by the people and for action by the States. Early in the following spring the Senate Judiciary Committee favorably reported a most drastic amendment to the espionage act, an amendment which made this act far more oppressive than the old alien and sedition laws, and on May 16, 1918, this measure became a law, and then ended all free and fearless discussion of public questions in the United States. At the time of the passage of that law, which, in clear violation of the first amendment to the Constitution, deprived the people of the United States of the rights of freedom of speech and of the press and peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances, only 11 States had ratified the eighteenth amendment. Not only was there no free and fearless discussion of this most important question, but a propaganda was started, the result, if not the purpose, of which was to spread the impression that the advocacy of the use of wine and beer was an evidence of sympathy with the German cause. That such a propaganda should succeed was quite natural, in view of the fact that those of German descent had been both manufacturers and users of wines and beers. On September 18, 1918, the Attorney General of the United States, A. Mitchell Palmer, who had been clothed by the provisions of the espionage act with extraordinary and despotic powers, at a meeting of the Democratic State committee at Harrisburg, Mr. Palmer himself being an advocate of national prohibition, made a speech the purport, if not the purpose, of which was to give the impression that some sinister relationship existed between the people and the interests in favor of the continued sale of liquors, wines, and beers, and those who were sympathetic with the German cause. On Thursday, September 19, Mr. JONES of Washington, an ardent advocate of national prohibition, introduced a Senate resolution, which was passed, calling for an investigation as to any propaganda which was then being carried on by those in favor of the use of beers, wines, and liquors, which resolution characterized them as follows:

> The organized liquor traffic of the country is a vicious interest, because it has been unpatriotic, because it has been pro-German in its sympathies and its conduct.

As a result of the passage of this resolution this same Judiciary Committee appointed a subcommittee of five, every member of which subcommittee had voted for the submission of the eighteenth amendment, and this subcommittee started an investigation, a record of which is to be found in the hearings on "Brewing and Liquor Interests and German Propaganda." This investigation was widely advertised throughout the country, and had the result of intimidating, even if it were not deliberately designed to do so, those who would in normal times have vigorously opposed the ratification by the States of the eighteenth amendment.

You may recall that so intolerant was the temper of the time that an attempt was made, vain and foolish though it was, to make it appear that even the defenders of the constitutional rights of free speech and free assemblage were sympathetic with the enemy, and there is not a doubt in my own mind, as I have indicated, that the Bill of Rights might have been stricken from the Constitution during that period by the same methods which wrote the eighteenth amendment into it. Not only this, but during the time of the pendency of the eighteenth amendment before the States for ratification millions of our young men were under arms on foreign soil and in Army camps, deprived in a large part of any opportunity of participating in the discussion and of influencing public opinion upon the question of the wisdom of thus amending the Constitution. The impropriety of amending our fundamental law during a time of war under such circumstances should, it seems to me, be apparent to all except the unreasoning fanatics. I shall only advert to the fact—not discuss it—that two-thirds of the total membership of the House did not vote for a submission of this amendment. That is not the paramount question. The paramount question is this: Can we in time of war disregard the first amendment to the Constitution, pass Federal statutes to destroy free speech, submit an amendment to the Constitution to the States, place in a conscripted army millions of our men, thus practically depriving them of political activity, carry on a propaganda designed to make opposition to the amendment appear to be sympathy with the cause of the enemy, and sincerely and successfully contend that we have complied with the spirit and the letter of the fifth article of the Constitution, which provides for its amendment?

If the Supreme Court upholds this method of procedure, then all men, regardless of how they feel upon the question of national prohibition, should be willing to advocate the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, in order that in normal times the people and their legislators should have an opportunity of determining for themselves, freed from all coercion, compulsion, and repression, this most important question.

We urge the repeal of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution and a reconsideration by the people of the great question involved in it under conditions which will insure an unimpassioned consideration, unclouded by the temporary conditions incident to a state of war, and unaffected by the hysteria and prejudice which were incident to its submission at a time when full and free discussion were impossible. We recognize the great problem involved in this question. We admire the sincerity and zeal which have inspired many of the advocates of total and drastic prohibition. If it really be the will of the country, expressed in accordance with the terms and spirit of the Constitution, that this provision be continued as a part of our fundamental law, we shall hope for the beneficent results which its advocates have prophesied. But we are unwilling to deprive large numbers of our people, who sincerely love our country and its institutions, of that which they deem it their right to possess, except under conditions which safeguard the rights of these people with scrupulous care. We view with concern the fact that millions of our countrymen feel and say to-day that they have been deprived of their liberties without any real opportunity to contest the issue and that they therefore look upon the Government not so much as the preserver but as the destroyer of the freedom of the individual. We desire to remove the deep-rooted feeling from the minds of a large proportion of our people that there has not been fair play on this issue. Many of us feel that while the use of certain alcoholic liquors should be regulated by local-option statutes, enacted in accordance with the will of the people, the recent measures adopted have gone so far that they may, with justification, be considered by some as an undue infringement upon personal self-determination. But whether we believe in total prohibition or not, those of us who are Republican liberals believe that any such drastic changes should be secured only in accordance with orderly processes and after a full, free, and unhampered discussion of the issues involved, in order that no man may justly feel that he lives under an autocratic system where all liberty is in danger.

REFERENDUM ON AMENDMENTS.

Believing that there should be a wider application of the principle of popular control in the process of amending the Federal Constitution, we hold that there should be an amendment providing that any proposed amendments to the Federal Constitution should be submitted only after two-thirds of the total membership of both Houses of Congress have voted favorably upon the resolution to submit the amendment, and adopted only after the majority of the total registered vote in each of three-fourths of all the States have, after a popular referendum, instructed their States to ratify the amendment. It has become apparent that it would be unwise and dangerous to hold to our present method of amending the Constitution without a referendum, which makes it possible for a bare majority of less than 8,000 of our citizens who are members of the State and Federal legislative bodies to alter quickly and perhaps so materially as to change its whole nature that fundamental law, the Constitution, which must preserve the inherent natural rights of more than a hundred and ten millions of our people.

RAILROADS.

Recognizing that our Government rests upon the principle of cooperation, we demand measures in harmony with our institutions for promoting cooperation not only for liberty but for the securing of that efficient social and industrial organization which will bring about increased production and a greater national wealth. The railroad problem presented an opportunity for the application of the principles of cooperation to an important industry. We were opposed to the Government ownership of railroads because Government ownership makes for that bureaucracy which tends to become autocratic and to deprive the people of their liberty. Before the war the railroads were operated under an obsolete and inefficient system, characterized by competition; competition of road with road under the Sherman law; competition between capital and management, labor and management, labor and capital, and competition or contests over rates between one or all of these and the consumer of transportation, the traveler or shipper. The railroads must ultimately be controlled by one of these factors which has become dominant through strenuous competition, or by all of them through some rational method of cooperation. Government ownership or nationalization, which would give us a consumers' or shippers' control, would tend toward a reduction of rates, the depression of wages, deficits, and a menacing bureaucracy. Financial or capital control, as in the old days, would make for excessive capital issues, with constant clashes between capital and labor, while a control only by the workers would create the possibility of such ruinous increases in wages as might threaten the financial stability of the roads, the efficiency of their operation, and thus the welfare of the workers themselves. Prior to the war the railroads were controlled by the bankers and investors represented upon the board of directors, by the duly elected representatives of organized labor who conferred with the management, and by the Interstate Commerce Commission, representing the public and having charge of rate regulations. This was an awkward competitive rather than a rational cooperative system of control. We favor privately owned, cooperating, regional railroad corporations, each controlled by a cooperative board, consisting of members, one-third of whom would represent the bankers and investors, one-third of whom, chosen by the employees, would represent labor, and one-third to be appointed by the Government, to represent the consumers of transportation.

There should be continued supervision by the Interstate Commerce Commission, a fixed low rate of return for capital, guaranteed by the Government, ample provisions for extensions and betterments, with an equitable distribution of the surplus earnings for the benefit of the employees. The vital reform to be contended for is some representation for the employees in the responsibility of management, and some participation by them in any excess of earnings.

This participation of the employees in the responsibility of management should not be confined to mere membership by a few in the directing boards. The elective system for the selection of shop foremen and men for other positions might be wisely and widely employed. The principle of democracy and cooperation in industry is a sound and progressive one, and in its rational application this country, with its large reserves of initiative and ingenuity, its absence of aristocratic traditions, and its unequaled capacity for self-government, should lead. This plan is not radical but the rational application of principles already recognized. In a large measure the officers of roads, those in charge of management, have risen from the ranks of employees, and they, with the employees, have conducted railroad transportation, often hampered in their work by the ambitious schemes of financial promoters and by the unskillful intermeddling on the part of governmental agencies. The application long ago of this principle of cooperation would have saved us from many evils. This principle of cooperation between capital and labor should be widely applied in this country, where, in an unsystematic manner, there have already been demonstrated the benefits to be secured from democracy in industry, with a participation of the workers in the management and the profits.

COOPERATION.

The people of this country and, indeed, of the world, are suffering great hardships from the high cost of living, which is due primarily to the underproduction and the exorbitant costs and profits connected with the distribution of the necessities and commodities of life. These evils are due to the failure to apply the rational principles of cooperation to both production and distribution. Production can not be increased so long as labor is considered to be a mere commodity. So long as labor is considered to be a mere commodity, the man who has labor to sell will naturally and properly sell as little as possible for the highest price, while the employer will seek to buy as much as possible for the lowest wage. Labor must be considered as capital, as an investment, which should earn interest, and those who furnish the money capital and those who furnish the labor must participate in the management, share the responsibility and the profits, and cooperate not for the profit only but to render the service of production. Unregulated competition between the distributors can be, with advantage, largely reduced, by agencies representing a rational cooperation between the producer and the consumer. Cooperation between the employer and the employee, with the sharing of the responsibility of the management and of profits, is considered by some to be a new and radical, if not a dangerous, departure, whereas it is but the application of an old principle to new conditions. In former times, and even now, on the small farm and in the small shop where but one or two are employed, the efficient application of the principle of cooperation has been secured. The sharing of responsibility for management, participation in profits, and cooperation for service must supplant the purchase of labor as a commodity and wholly selfish competitions and conflicts for the mere money returns and wages, with no regard for the social service or for the responsibility resting upon all elements engaged in production for the common welfare.

ECONOMY AND TAXATION.

We demand such elimination of governmental extravagance as will make possible a large reduction in the intolerable burden of taxation now resting upon our people, but with due regard to the importance of reducing the national debt, and for the principle that a larger proportion of the surplus income than was taken before the war should be subject to taxation by justly graduated income and inheritance taxes for the improvement of those Government agencies for promoting education, health, and the common welfare which tend to increase the common wealth and prosperity. The importance of a speedy reduction of the national debt can scarcely be overemphasized.

OUR SOLDIERS.

Recognizing the fact that we owe to those heroic men who in our valiant and invincible armies stayed that mighty hostile flood, turned the tides of war, and won for our arms an immortal victory, preserving our liberty, a debt of gratitude which we can never pay, we yet hold that this Nation is under a high obligation to render every possible service in the care and rehabilitation of those soldiers who have suffered disability or disease, in the furnishing of general or vocational educational opportunities to those who desire it, in assisting all men who need it to find congenial occupations, and in the paying of generous compensation to those who have suffered permanent disability.

SENSE IN THE CENSUS.

We urge such a revision of the methods of the national census as would make it a rational, systematic, social, and industrial survey of our population, with a card-index method for the keeping of constantly up-to-date information.

EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES.

We insist that effective Federal employment agencies, with branches in every part of the country, particularly in the rural sections, are necessary, and believe that much of the seasonal unemployment might be relieved by a proper distribution of necessary public works through the year.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

We favor the erection, in time, of a practical rather than architectural Federal public building in every county of the Union as part of a national public-building program, which building would serve as a community center and for the housing of the local branches of the Federal educational, health, employment, census, agricultural, and post-office agencies. We believe that there should be central schools in rural districts, with more commodious buildings, and a more general use of public buildings as community centers.

COOPERATIVE ORGANIZATIONS.

In order to bring about a radical reduction in the high cost of living, which is becoming a burden almost too great for the people to bear, we favor measures which will encourage the organization of cooperative buying and selling organizations in order to bring the products of the farm direct to the consumers, and to make possible cooperative effort between great groups of farmers, workers, and persons living on salaries, wages, or small fixed incomes to secure the necessaries of life without the high costs now incident to our system of distribution, and to this end we favor the passage of a national law for the incorporation and regulation of cooperative organizations in order that the cooperative system may be encouraged in all the States.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

We urge a nation-wide cooperation among the people for a reduction in the cost of living by the stimulation of productive effort, particularly in agriculture, by the harmonious cooperation between capital and labor for larger production, by personal economy, by the elimination of extravagance and waste in distribution, by the increase of taxation of unused land tending to promote its use, by the development of unused natural resources, and the cure of currency inflation by rigid governmental economy and a speedy reduction in the public debt.

We hold that a rational conservation and development of our natural resources and of our vast territory, capable of supporting in comfort and luxury 500,000,000 people, would give us an abundance of wealth such as would relieve the widespread misery and poverty in the United States. We hold that the improper training of our youth, disablement and death of the family support by preventable injury and diseases, inadequate insurance systems, unnecessary unemployment, imperfect cooperation, and the failure to secure the application in a scientific manner of labor to the development of these vast resources are the removable causes of much misery and poverty, in themselves causes of underproduction.

AGRICULTURE.

No class of our citizens has endured more from the injustice of personal and arbitrary government than those who are engaged in agriculture. Our farmers have suffered untold hardships, because for many years our legislative bodies have not been dealing with agricultural problems intelligently and effectively. In my remarks in opposition to the food-control bill I referred to the failure of our agricultural development to keep pace with the growth of our population and to the dangers which must be attendant upon the further decline of agriculture in the United States. My fears as to the unfortunate effects which would follow the food-control law were entirely justifiable, as events have proven. During the war the farmers were compelled to sell in a controlled market and to buy in an unregulated one, while for many years the costs of production have consumed legitimate profits. Men will move from the less profitable to the more profitable employments when it is possible to do so, and the steady flow of population from our rural districts to the cities is the most conclusive evidence of the most unsatisfactory conditions which have caused agricultural operations to be unprofitable, resulting in the failure of food production to keep pace with the consumptive demand. In view of the actual and more serious threatened food shortage throughout the world, a failure to secure a greatly increased acreage in the spring-wheat sections, in view of the decrease of nearly 30 per cent in the winter-wheat acreage, would be an indication of a serious situation. The decline of agriculture is directly traceable to governmental mistakes. Realizing that agriculture is the basic industry upon which the welfare and wealth of all depend, we who are Republican liberal farmers demand such a total change in the administrative policy as will result in a greater prosperity for our agricultural population and check that steady flow of people from the country to the cities which, if continued, must prove disastrous. We demand more good roads, better schools, improved rural social conditions, community market centers, the extension of the parcel post, more efficient methods for agricultural education and the adoption of every method which will stimulate an interest in and a knowledge of the fundamental nature and importance of agriculture. We demand an extension of the facilities which will encourage cooperative buying, selling, and shipping, cooperative creameries, warehouses, elevators, newspapers, and cooperative banks, all of which have been a great assistance to agriculture and should be encouraged. We believe that there should be a law for the Federal incorporation of cooperative and other corporations. We demand that there shall be appointed a Secretary of Agriculture who has actual knowledge of farm conditions, a country-minded man who will have extensive studies made of farm-management problems, costs of production, including losses in soil fertility, and who will have published the results of these investigations. There must be steps taken to encourage the ownership of farms. Every effort must be made in the direction of the wise conservation of our land and natural resources. The loss of soil through erosion which follows forest devastation must be checked, the export from this country of material from our natural phosphate beds must be regulated, and native sources of nitrates and potash sought and developed. Realizing the importance to the farmer of the great corporations which buy from him his products, such as the packing houses, and of those which sell to him, particularly those manufacturing agricultural implements, we insist that there must be fair regulatory legislation for the protection of the agricultural interests, while promoting the efficiency and service of these corporations. A simplification and standardization of farm implements and machinery, making possible quantity production of original machines and of repair parts, would save millions to the American farmers. A nation-wide movement for the advancement of agriculture could be made to accomplish untold benefits by the securing of an abundant supply of raw products and food, and thus increasing the wealth and prosperity of all of our people.

CHILD LABOR.

We insist upon the abolition of child labor, reasonable hours for all women workers in industry, and the elimination of insanitary working and living conditions. Children should learn rather than labor, and there must be more adequate educational facilities and higher pay for teachers.

RESTORE PEACE AND SELF-DETERMINATION.

We urge the immediate reestablishment of peace on the general principles enunciated in the 14 points to which we and our associates in the war were in honor pledged, and from which the proposed treaty has radically and in fundamental respects departed. We demand the withdrawal of our troops from Europe, particularly from Russia; the principle of self-determination for the nations of Europe, particularly Ireland and Russia; and the extending of our friendly offices to the Russian people, to assist them to such extent as they may desire to establish a rational form of government in accordance with their own needs and aspirations and not by force and coercion from without.

We believe that the iniquitous treaty of Versailles is largely responsible for the present chaos and confusion in Europe, of which the new counter-revolution in Germany is the latest symptom, and that we can restore order and sanity to the world only by a rejection of the treaty as it has been framed and by approaching the whole problem of peace in a new and different spirit from that in which this vindictive and impossible document was drawn.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR COLONIES.

Realizing that the vast work of world rehabilitation must be carried on through the sympathetic cooperation of the strong nations of the world, and that any serious conflict of aims and purposes between the great English-speaking peoples would be deplorable, we express our gratification that one of the great political parties in England, the party which may shortly come into power, has taken a definite stand in favor of the principle that all colonial peoples should be held in wardship only, and that it is incumbent upon all countries having colonies to meet the responsibility of fitting the subject people for self-government and for ultimate admission into the society of nations. This is the position taken so clearly by the United States in the great proclamation of 1898, which outlined the policies which would be carried out by the United States with reference to the Philippines, and outlined the policies which we believed should be finally adopted by all the great nations which have colonial possessions.

MERCANTILE MARINE.

Realizing the necessity for means for the carrying on of commerce with those people who are so desperately in need of those articles which we may have for export, we favor the building up of an American mercantile fleet, which shall either be Government owned or privately owned with substantial Government subsidy.

INCREASING NAVY.

In view of the great responsibility now resting upon this Republic for the furnishing of a strong leadership, and looking forward to the time when there shall be complete national disarmament, we insist, as a somewhat temporary policy, upon the building and maintenance of a Navy not exceeded by any other power, in order that there may be cooperation between England and the United States as equals for the bringing about of order and a progressive peace.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

We denounce the League of Nations as it was proposed as a scheme worked out in secret by imperialistic interests for a new armed coalition designed to preserve the old international order, with its longer intolerable system of colonial expansion and human exploitation. We urge the calling of an international convention at an early date to consider an international arrangement for a concert of nations for cooperation between the nations for the elevation, education, liberation, and ultimate self-determination of the backward peoples of the earth, with international boards of education, health, labor, commerce, land reclamation and colonization, and rational efforts for a just and upbuilding world peace by the elimination of the social and economic causes of war.

Mr. President, I have purposely not enlarged my discussion of the League of Nations question, because I have upon my desk a statement issued by a Maryland mother who had four sons in the war, one of whom fought in the Argonne, a statement which, I believe, expresses the views of millions of American mothers on the peace treaty and particularly as to article 10. In view of the fact that I have curtailed my argument upon this subject, I ask permission to insert the statement to which I have referred as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SPREAD OF CIVILIZATION.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, we consider with sorrow that approximately two-thirds of the human race, about 1,000,000,000 human beings, under present world conditions live in degrading poverty, misery, and paganism, existing without the light and comfort of true civilization, perishing without medical attention or the consolation of faith, and believing that the application of the principles of justice, the elimination of exploitation, adequate education of the people, and a proper development of the undeveloped resources of the world would remove this unfortunate condition, we urge the great problem upon the consideration of all liberal parliaments, in order that there may be a common action to cure a common evil.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

We hope for the immediate ratification by the States of the constitutional amendment granting suffrage to women, and look forward to their full and equal participation in the affairs of government as a necessary, natural, and logical extension of the democratic principles.

LABOR AND INJUNCTIONS.

We are opposed on principle to the use of the injunction as a method of settlement of disputes between labor and capital. While we would take all possible measures to remove the causes of industrial disputes and for bringing about a just and speedy settlement of such disputes, we hold that for the Government to take the strike as a weapon from labor by the use of the injunction is to create a condition of servitude which is abhorrent to the traditions and instincts of a free people.

REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT.

We believe that the discretion given to legislative bodies to be the judges of the qualifications of their own members was never intended to enable a majority to exclude the duly elected representatives of a minority party, and we favor such limitations upon the causes for exclusion of such duly elected representatives as shall prevent the arbitrary exercise of this power in violation of the established principles of the republican form of government.

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING.

We believe that there should be devised a national system for the better physical training of our youth with measures for the development in them of a high sense of obligation and duty as citizens of a free and self-governing Republic, but we feel that at this time universal military training is not necessary and that the funds which would be required for its establishment might be better employed in compensating those who have served in our armies and for the further extension of those agencies for the promotion of education, health, and the general welfare, the deficiency and inadequacy of which agencies as they have existed were disclosed by the war.

There are many other national and world problems to which I might refer and which it would be profitable to discuss at some length if time permitted, but I have desired to mention but a few of the most important ones in order to make clear the general attitude and point of view of that large and increasing number of our citizens who could most properly call themselves Republican liberals.

DANGERS OF REPRESSION.

Such Republican liberals would not widely extend the functions of government, but bring nearer to perfection its performance of present functions. They would not expand the powers of government, but rather enlarge individual opportunity and liberty. Over and above all other national problems rises this great issue of the restoration of free popular government and a fuller realization of liberty.

There have risen to power in this country Bourbons who have lost faith in popular government. During the period of the war the destinies of the world have been directed by political reactionaries, but now that peace has come we must end their rule. Exaltation to a position of political power too often causes an insulation in self-conceit which separates the official from the energizing, vitalizing currents of thought generated in the giant dynamo of the mind of the masses. Pride of opinion, prejudice, and stupid dogmatism infect and fester to intolerance in the bureaucratic brain. When future generations shall read the history of our time they will be amazed to learn how much the statesmen of this period have seemed to lack the common sense and sound judgment of the common man. Popular government is rational government, because the inexpert but unperverted understandings of the people are much more reasonable and reliable than the prejudiced and perverted thoughts of rulers. Popular government has in this war demonstrated its inviolability. Distrusted, despised, desecrated, rejected, immolated upon the altars of war by men mad with Cæsarian conceit and drunk with usurped and temporary power, it yet emerges from the fires unscathed, vindicated, triumphant, with all its pristine symmetry and strength and with a new-found excellence.

The most dangerous adversaries of popular government, of liberty, were not the autocratic Kaiser in his helmet of gold and all his mighty hosts of armed myrmidons clothed in all the habilaments of modern war, driving on their awful engines of destruction, and filling the very air men breathed with invisible death. These never had a chance of a final decisive victory against our liberty.

The most mortal enemies of our freedom were those false and faithless ones at home, who at her heart and into her very vitals struck treasonous and deadly blows. Her worst foes were those of her own household, who counseled the abandonment of her high principles for purposes of war. They distrusted in their hearts the adaptability of popular government to all conditions. They doubted the rationality, the stability, the indestructibility of free government under such an ordeal. They argued that democracy was a fair-weather government, and that hard and heartless autocracy alone could withstand the storm and stress of such a war. Of little faith, they questioned the sanity, wisdom, and loyalty of the millions of the minds and hearts of all America. Bourbons misread or misinterpret history and fail to understand the deep significance of great events. Our Bourbons have recently failed to remember. They forgot the invincibility of the free and that the slave can never be a warrior. They failed to remember their history—the plains of Marathon, Thermopylæ, Tours, Valmy, Waterloo, Bunker Hill, and Yorktown—and sought to win a war for the preservation of our liberty by an imitation of the methods of a czar. But as the everlasting mountain emerges from the mists, touched by the magic of the advancing morning sun, so from the clouds of war there have appeared the eternal truths. And now we know that each time we violated the established principles of the Republic our thrusts made new wounds, cut nutrient arteries, and weakened her for war, while infection and corruption followed the treacherous, poisonous daggers.

With un-American, despotic statutes you terrorized our people into silence, and more than six hundred millions of the people's money appropriated for airplanes were squandered by protected, inefficient bureaucrats while the sons of the people, who had responded to the Republic's call for defenders, lay in the front-line trenches of a foreign land, naked of protection from the low-flying, armed, destroying vultures of a cruel enemy. You passed this gag law, and a timid, trifling, vacillating, and wholly incompetent administration, distrustful of American patriotism and shielded from a popular wrath which would have lashed it into action, delayed for 18 months the enactment of man-power legislation to mobilize the forces of the Nation to meet a deadly peril. You intimidated critics and silenced the voice of the people, while the War and Navy Departments, made immune by the censor and fed to fat complacency on adulation, dawdled and delayed when desperate situations demanded heroic remedies of arms, supplies, men, ordnance, and ships. It is well that Providence had ordained that we should be saved, even from our own folly, and that the hearts of our heroic sons, exposed beyond need or reason to danger and to death as they faced, unsupported at times by ordnance, the deadly fire of the enemy, were baptized with a valor and devotion to the cause of liberty which made them invincible, even against such a mighty foe, and enabled them, with the help of the God of the Republic, to win a glorious victory.

DISINTEGRATION OR COOPERATION.

Mr. President, since the war, as I have intimated, there has been taking place a rapid, dangerous, and destructive disintegration of our country. There are many indications that our national unity may soon be broken into a disorganized multitude of antagonistic and irreconcilable parts. On every hand we see the unhappy evidences and consequences of class consciousness, intolerance, class hatreds, and class conflicts. Ever-widening gulfs seem to be separating capital and labor, employer and employee, while the reactionaries and the radicals have declared relentless war upon each other. This whole process of disintegration is impoverishing, paralyzing, and demoralizing our country. What might be a vast, effective, swiftly moving cooperative mechanism with an all but limitless power for beneficent creation is being slowed and stalled by competitive friction. The only remedy is to bring into full play and operation the cooperative forces.

During the war, although we failed to properly organize the Nation, there was achieved some measure of cooperation throughout the country for the accomplishment of a clearly perceived common purpose, and we gained some faint conception of the huge, the enormous reserves of hitherto unsuspected productive and creative power which might be utilized by an organized and effective application of the principles of cooperation.

We need to restore again in America national community of thought, national community of purpose, national community of action, and to secure these in even greater measure.

The common mind, when its processes are undisturbed by censorship, when there is full and fearless expression and discussion and the unhampered interchange of opinion, the common mind of a noble nation fairly informed and freely functioning is the nearest approach we can have to the infinite wisdom of the omniscient Deity. Community of purpose among a great and enlightened people must be the best expression of the infinite purpose. Community of action, cooperation among such a people for a great and beneficent purpose common to all, conceived and understood by all, must give us the most complete and effective human manifestation, in this world of limitations, of the beneficent creative and constructive power of Omnipotence.

As our hearts go out in gratitude to our heroic youth who were our defenders; as our sympathy and affection enfold those who, for their country, have become diseased, crippled, and blinded from their wounds; as our tears fall for those who sleep beneath the silent stars and simple crosses on the scarred fields of France, may this be for us an hour of serious self-examination. Our task is incomplete. As collaborators and cooperators we must all share in the great enterprise.

BUILDERS OF LIBERTY.

The temple of liberty which we were destined to erect here in the western world is not built. It is building. The Constitution written in days of clearer inspiration by our fathers is the noble plan. From ocean to ocean stretches the continent upon which we are to construct it. Far flung are the fabulous riches for its fabrication—pleasant valleys; stately rivers; lofty mountains; cataracts and plunging waterfalls, eager to be harnessed to drive the electric dynamos of industry; waving forests; sweet-scented woods; coal; iron; priceless stores of minerals, silver, copper, and gold—a vast imperial domain capable of supporting in comfort and luxury one-half a billion of people, and, more than these, one hundred millions of beating patriot hearts who thrill at her story, glory in her power, pray for her preservation, and are ready to die in her defense. These are the wealth of materials for her building. May the time of our trial and affliction be a time of vision. May we now clearly behold our opportunity and our destiny. May we now rededicate ourselves unreservedly to sacrifice and to unwearying service until the nobler and more lofty fane of liberty is full complete.

If our souls can be filled with that same devotion to the principles of liberty and with that same faith in free institutions which inspired the soldiers in our armies, we need not fear this great issue, we need not hesitate to raise the battle cry against all the reactionary forces of autocracy and un-American Bourbonism. Let us go back to freedom, back to the principles of the Republic, back to liberty. May we soon hear some silver-throated clarion call our valiant youth to this great cause of liberty. May we soon hear once more the mighty tones, pealing down through the corridors of the years, of that great bell which once proclaimed liberty to all the peoples throughout the widest confines of a waiting world.

APPENDIX.

OUR SACRED SOIL.

[By Ida M. H. Starr, Easton, Md.]

HAVE THEY FORGOTTEN THAT THE SUN RISES IN THE EAST?

Southern war mothers ask if administration Senators have wandered so long in dusky twilight that they can not see the sunlight of facts that reveals the iniquity of League of Nations covenant. (From the Manufacturers' Record.)

Thank God, I live in the country. There is no hour of my day but I am up against indisputable facts. I live in the real country, not the suburban sort that camouflages nature but in a place where, if my fuel supply runs short, I must go out in the woods, mark trees, have them chopped down, hauled to the woodshed, sawed, split, and finally carted to the cellar. I know just how much dynamic force I must expend to get this fuel ready for the furnace and know the sound of every foot that shuffles behind the cart.

The sunrise is not a poetic fancy to me, not a word to rhyme with enterprise, or authorize, or otherwise—no; it is one of my indisputable facts, for I watch it every morning as the days speed along. At night my perspective across the bay is blurred, but with the morning my vision is clarified, the clear light of the early sunrise gives me the lines of the far country in their true outline.

I know to a second when to expect the first faint tints of dawn, to a second when to await the first glory of daybreak. Facts—facts from dawn until noon, for when the shadows on our veranda are vertical I know it is midday, and when the sun reaches just a certain height over against the bay I know that the gardeners must gather up their tools, for night is near. Facts, always facts. Not delusions, but great, primal facts hit me in the face however I may wish to escape them. They are eternally before me and they form the basis of all my thought. They are the cosmic origin from which all of my life radiates. All fiction, all art, all poetry, all friendships, all philosophy, all the problems of my life, and all world problems must line up with these indisputable facts which are forming my moral code.

In the long, silent twilight, my work finished, I sit and watch the glow of the fire, see the logs which I have seen fall in the woods burn before me, and then with a mind that has been saturated with realities all the day long, a mind stripped of distortions and abortions of truth, a mind clarified by the eternal facts of nature, with this equipment I read the events of the times and form my opinions.

I sent four sons to the Great War. My entire soul was aflame to rid the world of the barbarous Hun. We didn't think then nor did not talk about "making the world safe for democracy." All that talk came later, not from the boys but from the men who were safely at home. The boys who went over knew that their country, their homes were in danger and they wanted to lick the Hun to a finish. It was all a perfectly simple, direct thought that inspired our boys, and with the simplicity of the sunrise in their souls they went to France.

A year ago to-day my son was in the Argonne. You men making laws up there in Washington do not know what that meant to mothers. I know what it meant to wait week after week for delayed news after the armistice was signed. I was not alone in my suspense. Millions of mothers felt and suffered as I did. Millions made even greater sacrifices than I, before whom I bow my head in reverence. We gave of our utmost. We gave for our country. Remember, there was no talk at that time about "making the world safe for democracy." We gave our sons for our country, for a country governed by and administered for Americans.

"The tumult and the shouting dies;
The captains and the kings depart;
Still stands thine ancient sacrifice,
An humble and a contrite heart.
Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget."

The treaty of peace and the covenant of the League of Nations was brought to us from the peace table in Paris.

Men have already written volumes on the questions which these documents have developed. These documents, I believe before God, are of more vital interest to mothers than to any other living beings, for the covenant of the League of Nations strikes directly at the heart of a home.

I shall not assert that the volumes that have been written on this great subject have been written with a deliberate intent to befog the minds of women, but it looks suspicious. Men may need a multitude of words and high-sounding rhetoric to impress the truth upon them, but women do not need these things. We reach conclusions by different channels than those employed by men. God somehow gave us a gift—call it what you will, intuition, vision, or any other word you like, the word does not matter—a fact remains. Women form their judgments by quick, sure methods, by sane methods. We see things suddenly in the right light, and the centuries have hallowed our wisdom, for did not "Mary know all these things"? Was she not the only one in her day who saw with the perspective of the sunrise?

Since the days of Mary men have thought to befog our brains by the multitude of their words and the brilliancy of their rhetoric, and never in all history has this tendency been more to the fore than at this time, when the League of Nations would be fastened upon us. But words, words, be they by the million, can not deceive mothers. We are up early in the morning, and while you men are asleep the sunrise is sweeping our souls clean.

The patriotism which rings now from the White House and from the administration Senators does not line up true with my sunrise or with anybody's sunrise who has ever seen a real one, and that is the reason we mothers of America hold our breath while you men up there in Washington are juggling with the fate of our sons and our country.

Do you think to deceive us when you say that the League of Nations as it came from Paris is the great step forward for our country? The panacea against all future wars? You hide the truth beneath a multitude of words, but you can not take from women their understanding of plain facts. We mothers meet facts always. Whether we live in the city or in the country, we know certain things to be right, and no amount of camouflage can separate us from this knowledge. We know that international questions are but an enlargement of domestic questions. We know that the questions that confront us in the League of Nations are fundamentally simple. We know that a man's first duty is to his home. This is a great primal fact. It admits of no argument. Our Government stands in the same relation to the American people that a man stands in relation to his children.

We know that the same laws that govern the sunrise govern families and govern nations. We mothers know these things and our understanding of them is simple, direct, and final.

Tell me what would happen if by some unforeseen swing of the pendulum the mayor of your town should decide that your home would be managed much better by a Jap, or a Chinaman, or a Turk, or a Hindu, or an Arab, or perhaps just by the neighbor across the way, than by your own wife or whomever chances to run your home. Look at this thing in a sane manner. Tell me, what would happen to the mayor of your town if he should issue such a mandate, what would the mothers of your homes say? Needless to repeat. Individuals, to develop, must master their own destinies. Neither individuals nor nations that profess to sanity would be willing to live under other conditions.

Can you conceive it possible for your home to be made into a Turkish harem, you men, you women of America? Your sacred home ruled by the caprices of the women of the East; your sacred walls filled with the hideous quarrels and jealousies of unknown peoples?

How many of us know the text of article 10, the article which, as the President asserted, if modified, would take the heart out of the covenant? Here is the text; everyone should memorize it; it should be on the tongue of every schoolboy as one of the great "shall nots" of our history. It is over these 11 short lines that the storm has broken, and to the lasting honor of those who have stood out against them do we mothers render our gratitude. The article reads:

"The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threats or danger of such aggressions, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled."

What is this council? Is it our Congress? Is it our Senate? Not at all. Neither our Congress nor our Senate have any voice in the council. What is the council? The council consists of representatives of the principal allied and associated powers, together with representatives of four other members of the league. Remember, in this council we Americans have one vote—one vote. All of Europe and the East have the other votes. What would happen if we should chance to send as our representative a mere man—one who occasionally makes mistakes, as you and I do; one who might, under stress of powerful influence, forget the American point of view, as some of us do when we receive the adulating flattery of foreign diplomats? Now, what would happen if there should be another flurry in the Balkans? What would happen if the council, with fighting blood in its veins, inherent through generations of martial influence, should cast its vote for war? In case our representative protested, how much would our one vote count for as against those of all the other powers? We would suddenly awake some morning to hear the newsboys crying out that the Balkans were at war again, or that the tribes of Arabia had broken their pact and were fomenting trouble, or that the Japs refused to give up Shantung, and China was in arms, or—why go further? Where would our one little vote be in the European hat?

This question can never be settled in the right way unless each man and woman in our country makes it personal to himself. Would you be willing to send your son or would you be willing to go yourself to fight the battles of the Armenians or the Turks or the Slavs? Would you be willing, on the voice of one man, to pour out the treasure of your soul and your house to settle the quarrels of the European cockpit?

We have of recent days gotten into a most complacent habit of saying, "Oh, yes; we'll send our Army." To those I would ask, "What do you mean by our Army? Do you mean to say that you can assume a high moral standard, then pay some one else to back up your principles—some one else to die for you?"

If we accept article 10 it means that you and I must be ready at any moment to answer the call of European diplomats. We must feel our obligations to the league covenant so deeply that we are willing to go ourselves into the desert and into the wilderness. Are you willing to go to the Far East? Are you willing to go into the ice and snow of Siberia and there expend the strength of your body to settle a far-distant neighborhood quarrel?

The entire question must be put up to us from a purely personal standpoint, for never has a more vitally dangerous policy been promulgated than that which we face as a Nation to-day. And this question must be translated to us in simple, plain language, stripped of all cant and idealism. We must hear the plain facts. I have such an unbounded faith in the good sense of our American people that I believe when they see the truth they shall not be content until this document is modified to such an extent that our country is in a position of safety.

One man, one American on the council! One man to speak for a nation! There is no one man who has ever been created who is qualified to speak for an entire nation. It takes the minds of many men, the wisdom of the many, to form a complete, composite public opinion; so for that reason our Congress and our Senate must ever have the last word; ever be the voice of the great majority; and if by nullifying the power of these two bodies we weaken our national life, we do so at the expense of our very existence, for the benefit of Europe and the Far East. Are we willing to commit this suicidal act?

We have been asked to ratify the treaty, "at whatever cost of independent action," and should we object to this document, we are told that we have "pygmy minds."

We mothers face simple facts. We know that the fathers of our children are not pygmies, and we know that we mothers were not pygmies when we sent our sons to France! What would become of "our country" if the policy of "without the dotting of an 'i' or the crossing of a 't'" should rule our destiny? The pronoun would be changed from "our" to "we." Foreigners abroad would exclaim, "We shall do thus and so with America;" this they would say of our country, our sacred country, for which we gave our sons—the country whose soil is the substance of our being, whose soil was watered by our tears, hallowed by our grief, glorified by our sacrifice! And now you men in Washington would fill our homes with the babel of the East. You would have our destines ruled by those who, racially, can never understand us.

Have the Senators of the Administration lived so long in hotels that they have forgotten what the word "home" means?

Have they wandered so long in the dusky twilight of the gods that they have forgotten that the sun rises in the east?

There are men, true men, we mothers know it, up there in Washington who are fighting to modify this iniquitous document, and back of these men let every true-hearted American stand with all his strength; for when you and I go our way and the day is spent, when history will record the sorrows and joys of our national family, these men who kept for us our undivided sovereignty will be the great ones of American tradition.

CIVIL-SERVICE RETIREMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS].

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Harrison	New	Spencer
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Sterling
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Sutherland
Curtis	Kendrick	Overman	Swanson
Dial	Kenyon	Page	Thomas
France	Keyes	Phipps	Trammell
Frelinghuysen	King	Pomerene	Underwood
Hale	Kirby	Sheppard	Walsh, Mass.
Harding	Lodge	Smith, S. C.	Watson
Harris	McNary	Smoot	Williams

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absentees, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. WADSWORTH answered to their names when called.

Mr. PITTMAN and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators. It is important that we shall have an executive session.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA, Mr. BORAH, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. MYERS, and Mr. SIMMONS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the pending bill has been a long time before the Senate. Of course its consideration has been interfered with by discussion of the peace treaty and by other important business of the Senate, but still it has remained the unfinished business. During days that it was thought full time would be given to the discussion of the bill other speeches have intervened on subjects quite foreign to the pending bill.

After the bill has been so long before the Senate it seems to me but reasonable that we should reach a unanimous-consent agreement as to the final disposition of the measure, and therefore I am going to propose this unanimous-consent agreement:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m., on the calendar day of Tuesday, March 23, 1920, the Senate will proceed to vote without further debate upon any amendment that may be pending or any amendments that may be offered to the pending bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition.

I wish to say in this connection that if we can have this unanimous-consent agreement it is my purpose to move a recess so as to shut off the morning hour to-morrow and allow us to give all the time that I think is needed for the discussion of the pending bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina objects.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. Let me say, when Senators object, that if it is as to the matter of time that the objection is made I think we can accommodate Senators in that regard. If to-morrow is too early a day, let it be Wednesday, or let it be Thursday, so that we may fix a definite time when the bill may be disposed of.

I am not particular as to the date, although I thought probably, from the course of the discussion heretofore, that we might end the discussion and reach a vote on the bill in one day, if we had one full day for it. Will not Senators, in view of the importance of the bill and of the length of time during which it has been before the Senate, agree to some day this week on which we may have the final vote on the bill?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, speaking for myself——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina has objected, the Chair understands, to the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. If objection is made and there is to be no unanimous consent, I desire to make a motion.

Mr. KING. May I have a few minutes before the executive session?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has stated its understanding of the present situation. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] makes a request for a unanimous-consent agreement and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] objects to it, and that is the end of that matter.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Massachusetts.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

PROPOSED RECESS.

Mr. STERLING. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow. I make the request so as to avoid having a morning hour.

Mr. KING. There is not a quorum present, I would say to the Senator, and if he is going to insist upon his request for a recess, I shall feel compelled to call for a quorum.

Mr. STERLING. Very well.

PROCEEDS OF LANDS IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 435, being the bill (S. 3867) authorizing the State of New Mexico to apply the proceeds of the grant to said State of 1,000,000 acres of land made by section 7 of the enabling act, June 20, 1910, for the reimbursement of Grant County, Luna County, Santa Fe County, and the town of Silver City, N. Mex.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 8, before the word "Luna," to strike out "and," and in the same line, before the word "Counties," to insert "and Hidalgo," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the authority and consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State of New Mexico to apply any part of the proceeds of the grant to said State of 1,000,000 acres of land made by section 7 of the enabling act of June 20, 1910 (36 Stats., 557), for the reimbursement of Grant, Luna, and Hidalgo Counties for interest paid by said counties on the bonds of Grant County, and for the reimbursement of Santa Fe County for interest paid by said county on the bonds of Santa Fe County, which said bonds were validated, approved, and confirmed by act of Congress of January 16, 1897 (29 Stats., 487), and also for the payment of the principal of the bonds issued by the town of Silver City and likewise validated by said act of January 16, 1897, and to reimburse the town of Silver City for interest paid by said town on said bonds, all in addition to the obligations provided in said enabling act to be paid from the proceeds of said grant.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the State of New Mexico to apply the proceeds of the grant to said State of 1,000,000 acres of land made by section 7 of the enabling act, June 20, 1910, for the reimbursement of Grant County, Luna County, Hidalgo County, Santa Fe County, and the town of Silver City, N. Mex."

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS (S. DOC. NO. 259).

The President pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

In response to the resolution adopted by the Senate on February 9, 1920, requesting me to propose conventions or treaties with the Republics of Mexico and of Central and South America, for the protection of birds that in the course of their annual migration pass through or from the United States and temporarily sojourn in the countries of Mexico and Central and South America, I transmit a report by the Acting Secretary of State, to whom the resolution was referred by my direction.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 22, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Almighty God our Heavenly Father, for the Christian religion and its holy ordinances. Especially do we thank Thee for the Christian Sunday—preeminently the Lord's Day—for its quiet and rest, and the peace it brings to the weary and heavy laden; for the opportunity it affords to the devout and worshipful soul; for the inspiration it brings to all, toward the higher and nobler life.

May the day that has gone prepare us for better work in the days that are to follow. Encourage every noble effort. Discourage every ignoble and selfish desire, that we may be in deed followers of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 13108).

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13108, the naval appropriation bill, with Mr. MANN of Illinois in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13108) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL EXPENSES.

The Secretary of the Navy shall send to Congress at the beginning of its next regular session a complete schedule or list showing the amount of money of all pay and for all allowances for each grade of officers in the Navy, including retired officers, and for all officers included in this act and for all enlisted men so included.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Under this term of "general expenses" I want to call the attention of the Chairman and the members of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union who are so patriotically assembled this morning for the purpose of considering that subject, to a fact that appears in yesterday's press to the effect that last month—February, 1920—in the various departments of this Government here, instead of reducing the unnecessary idle clerical force now existing in this city, that there were nearly a thousand additions to the service. To be exact, there were 2,573 separations from the service, while there were 3,362 new, green clerks employed and given a civil-service status, making an addition of 789 to the clerical force in one month, rather than a decrease. That is the most remarkable incident of governmental failure to economize of which I am able to conceive. It is generally understood and conceded by those who have investigated that there are about 40,000 useless, idle, unnecessary Government employees still here in Washington, and this exists notwithstanding the alleged attempt on the part of every committee to reduce them, because it is stated at the beginning of almost every bill that we have reduced expenditures and diminished the force, thus giving it out to the public that we have cut them loose and sent them home, when, as a matter of fact, almost each month the number of unnecessary employees here, instead of being reduced, is increasing. Now, who is responsible for it? We say that by cutting down these lump-sum appropriations we are reducing the number, that by cutting down lump-sum appropriations we are preventing the departments from calling in new ones and forcing them to discharge the idle ones, and yet day after day and week after week and month after month the departments are calling for new clerks, additional green clerks, not using the trained clerks that have been in the departments for months and years and who are unnecessary and idle now, not using them if any are necessary, and thereby getting the benefit of their experience, but to call in new green ones and train them and thus add to the present idle clerical force each month. I want to say it is a farce that we have been guilty of that ought to be stopped. We alone are responsible for it because we permit it. The Civil Service Commission is advertising every day for new clerks. Why can not we stop it? Are we impotent? Are we without power? Are we here as rubber stamps to carry out the will of these departments here or are we going to impress our will upon theirs? Are we going to make our will paramount to theirs?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for an additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, I have the greatest confidence in the world in the great majority leader, with qualifications. [Laughter.] I know that he can put a stop to this if he wants to do so. I know he has the power. I know this great Committee on Naval Affairs has the power, so far as this bill is concerned, and I want to ask the distinguished chairman of this committee what has his committee done with regard to this great question of cutting down the expenses of this Government and cutting off useless, idle employees, not merely by reducing lump-sum appropriations, but by stating to the department that they have to cut loose their idle employees and send them back and quit calling on the Civil Service Commission for new, green employees for the Government? These 40,000 useless, idle, unnecessary, war-emergency clerks here in Washington will never be discharged and sent home until we force it by some affirmative action. When are we going to do it? When are we going to begin?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish I had the power and the authority which the gentleman from Texas suggests that I have, but which he will realize on reflection I have not, to regulate employment in the executive departments of the Government. This is a Government of three independent coordinate branches. We legislate and appropriate; the judiciary interprets and enforces; the executive branch conducts the business of the Government. This Congress, Republicans and Democrats—for we are not claiming exclusive credit for it—reduced appropriations for the current fiscal year nearly a billion dollars below what the departments asked. If we had given what they asked, they would have had a billion dollars more, but we cut in many places so closely that we were fearful that we were making it difficult to conduct the public business in view of the constant insistence of the departments that they needed more money than we were giving them. The Congress can not tell in the case of every department just how many clerks they need, how much help they need. We use our best judgment, but we must be in a considerable degree guided by the demands of the officials of the departments. The department or bureau will argue through its representatives before the Appropriation Committee for hours in favor of, say, $100,000 or $200,000 or $500,000 for clerks, and the committee, trying to do its duty, anxious to economize, reduces that estimate just as far as they dare reduce it and avoid the just criticism of crippling the public service; and yet when that is done, when that reduction is made, we frequently find more people are employed than in our opinion are necessary. Congress can not control these things any further than to reduce appropriations as far as we can under our responsibility and not actually cripple the public service. We certainly do go that far, and having done that they have still left sums of money more than are necessary or sums of money that can be utilized in ways we did not contemplate. The Lord knows it is not our fault. We are trying to cut as closely as we can in view of the clamor of the departments for more, but I want to say to my friend that on this side we do not want to place any department of the Government in a position where they can justly and properly charge us with actually crippling the necessary public service. We do not want to do that.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the distinguished majority leader yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The document I have just handed the gentleman shows that during February, last month, there were 789 more new employees taken in than old ones that were sent home—789 additional ones. Now, does not the gentleman think if these departments needed these new employees they should have kept the old ones and not taken on new and green ones?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. May I have one minute more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for one minute more. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. I do. I think the departments are not reducing their employees as they should, and they are not justified in taking on employees to the extent that they are doing. But I do not see how Congress can very well regulate that except as it reduces appropriations so far as we can reduce them without being subject to the charge, and the proper charge, that we are crippling the public service. I say again, as I said the other day, that, do its best, Congress can not so restrict the appropriations for a great department as to render it impossible for a careless or unfit official to waste the public money to some extent.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How did the gentleman from Wyoming get the floor? I did not want to disturb him while he was making his speech, but I would like to inquire by what kind of——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman rose in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Texas to strike out the last word of the paragraph.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He never said a word about striking out the last word.

Mr. MONDELL. "The gentleman from Wyoming" was not responsible for the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not for the Chair to say.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, my motion was just a pro forma one, and I will ask to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask that the committee allow me to speak to the different paragraphs of this bill for a few minutes? I would like to have 5 or 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUTLER. If I do not consume that much time the Government will save money thereby.

Directly I will endeavor to answer the inquiry made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], because I have some memoranda here that I think it is but fair the committee should have.

This bill is the result of 10 weeks of hard work. Your committee has done its level best to continue this great department of the Navy in good workable condition and has endeavored, with the assistance of those in authority, to take from the bill that which might be eliminated. It is based upon appropriations for 120,000 sailor men. The regular Navy consists of 143,500 men and boys. It consists, also, when the full number authorized by law are commissioned, of some 5,500 officers of the line. Of that number we have but half at this time. It is impossible, it seems, to obtain enough officers to properly take care of the service. When I say to properly take care of it I mean to bring it up to what the law permits. We hope, however, within a few months to suggest to the House a plan by which men in the Navy may be brought up from the ranks and prepared for commissioned rank.

I have told you the number of men upon which this program has been based. Now, I will give you the number of ships. There are, in my judgment, but two great things, my friends, to consider in making up a bill of this kind: First, the men and then the ships. In 1916 this House authorized a great naval program. The war was about to take place, as many of us thought. Congress therefore directed that there should be laid down 156 ships of war. Of that number, 16 were great ships of war—10 great battleships of more than 30,000 tons, with a complement of 1,400 men each, and 6 great battle cruisers of nearly 40,000 tons each and with 180,000 horsepower. During the war we were compelled to suspend this program. It was impossible to find ways upon which to put the keels or to find the men to build the ships. Therefore it has been but recently that this program has proceeded—I should say only within the last year, possibly within the last 15 months—that we have been able to go forward with this part of the program. However, much of the program as to the smaller ships already has been completed.

It will be interesting perhaps for you to know that, according to the comparison made by some of us—and we are not military experts—if the present programs for the various navies of the world are continued until 1924, from the best information we can obtain—remember what I say, please, the present programs—I believe that America will have the foremost Navy in strength and efficiency of any in the world.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BUTLER. With great pleasure.

Mr. LAZARO. Has the gentleman given any thought to the decision of Admiral Jellicoe to permit Canada to build a navy of its own?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes. I have thought of that, I will say to my friend from Louisiana. I understand that England proposes to hand over to her colony, to her strong ally, to her sister, some ships of war, that Canada may maintain them. England is not asking, as I understand it, that Canada should construct new ships. But the ships of England, I would like to say to you, my colleagues, when extended in battle array, cover a distance of 74 miles; and so England can afford to do what, as I understand it, she proposes to do; that is, to hand over to her colonies a few of these ships in order that her colonies may maintain them. With that we have nothing to do, I will say to my friend. We only considered that in estimating what perhaps would be the wise thing for America to do.

Mr. LAZARO. I merely mentioned that because of the fact that you said you were keeping track of the other nations of the world.

Mr. BUTLER. I trust the gentleman will understand it means England and her colonies together.

Mr. WINGO. Would the gentleman kindly repeat the number of the large battleships and the number of cruisers which he mentioned a while ago that are embodied in our 1916 program, the number of men and officers that are needed to properly man those vessels?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir. The act of 1916 directed that there should be constructed 10 battleships of certain tonnage and 6 battle cruisers of certain tonnage. Now, when that program is completed we will have completed all the ships that have been authorized, and I will say to my friend it will require the full complement of the Navy, 143,000 men, with 5,500 officers of the line, to man them all.

Mr. WINGO. How many men and how many officers are required by each of these battleships?

Mr. BUTLER. They ask for 1,400 men.

Mr. WINGO. How many officers?

Mr. BUTLER. Seventy or eighty.

Mr. WINGO. How many for the cruisers?

Mr. BUTLER. I am unable to tell my friend, but I think a few more men and a few more officers.

Mr. WINGO. Than the battleships?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir. The cruisers are new boats. These are the largest ships the world has undertaken to build.

Mr. WINGO. The cruisers?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir. They have, each, 180,000 horsepower.

Mr. PADGETT. And battleships also?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; the battleships are the largest.

Mr. WINGO. I was trying to figure out the additional number of officers and men necessary for these ships. The cruisers will require about the same number of men and officers as the new battleships?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir; certainly.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Coming back again to the question I asked the gentleman a while ago, I was trying to find out how our strength would compare with that of England. The gentleman said that England would merely give some of her battleships to Canada. What I was trying to get at is, will that mean a part of a great, big navy nearer home?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; Canada is nearer home. But I always think of Canada as a warm friend, near at hand.

Mr. LAZARO. There is no doubt about the fact that Canada is a part of another nation?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; and they are strong and loyal to the mother country. There is no doubt about that. But under the dominion of England and her Provinces there will be at that time, if the present program continues, about 60 great ships of war belonging to England and her Provinces.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I thought that perhaps the answer which the gentleman gave to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] might lead the gentleman from Arkansas into a slight error. Of course, these new ships, when commissioned, will require the number of officers and men stated, but older ships will be laid up and perhaps the addition of men and officers may not be great.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, this is a very interesting discussion. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] is about to expire. I ask unanimous consent that he may have such time as he may need to conclude, say 10 minutes more.

Mr. BUTLER. I have the figures that have been worked out here by our experts.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I will ask two questions in one, and the gentleman will then be able to furnish the information I want. As suggested by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY], by the time these new ships are completed and in the service there will be several of our old ships that will become obsolete and out of commission?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WINGO. When does the gentleman expect that these new cruisers and battleships will come in, giving the number that will come in within reasonable probability, and what will be the strength of the Navy then, counting the obsolete battleships, cruisers, and others, all complete when this program is finished?

Mr. BUTLER. In 1924——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will ask the gentleman if he has any definite information as to the truth of the statement that appeared in the newspapers last week that England was quitting the business of buidling battleships?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman know anything about it?

Mr. BUTLER. I shall be glad to answer the two questions. We asked the department to furnish us with the best information that the department had upon the building programs of the different nations of the world, and there are five great nations building great ships: Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and our own country, America. That information was given to us by the highest authority there is, as we know it, and therefore I discredit the statement made in the newspapers. I will say, in answer to my friend from Missouri, that I discredit that statement, and that I prefer to accept the information from our own people abroad. That is what these Governments propose to do.

I will say further that the military men have agreed that it is absolutely impossible to construct battleships or to build navies without the world knowing it; and therefore, with that understanding, I am disposed to credit only the information given to us by the Navy Department, and through the officials whose business it is to find the information.

Now I doubt very much whether this great program of ours can be completed in 1924. The effort was made to complete it in three years. I requested the Secretary of the Navy to divide it into four years, believing it could not be completed in three years, thereby lessening the annual demand upon the Treasury. He consented to do it, and the program is now divided into four years. The military men expect they will be able to complete it in four years. I doubt very much if they can, but certainly in 1924 or 1925 the whole program will be completed. At that time England will have, if she continues with her present program, 60 great ships. She is now building one ship. I believe that ship is about completed. It will be the Hood. I believe she is laying down no other great ships. France is building nine battleships, Japan six battleships and cruisers, and Italy four battleships.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Do I understand the gentleman to say that some one in the Navy Department informed him that France and Italy were pursuing their construction program and going on with the building of capital ships?

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to my friend the Navy Department did not inform me. It informed the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It informed the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will state positively that that is not correct, and it ought to be known that that is not true.

Mr. BUTLER. That man knows more than the rest of us do. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I know what anybody ought to know.

Mr. BUTLER. I never was over there, and so I do not know of my own knowledge; but I do know this, that we have appropriated a considerable sum of money to obtain this very information; and a man in high rank, in whom I have great personal confidence, and the committee has the same, gave us these figures, which I believe are absolutely reliable. He is a great-Navy man, and would ask for more ships if he thought they were needed.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to a question for information?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. How much larger is the naval program of France this year and next year than it was before the European war?

Mr. BUTLER. I will be very glad to give it to the gentleman as near as I can. If my friend from North Carolina will just be patient with me for a moment, I shall be glad first to answer the question asked by my friend from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. KITCHIN. As to the program of Great Britain, how much larger is it for this year than before the Euorpean war?

Mr. BUTLER. I will have to go back to my figures; but, in my judgment, the number of ships in England's fleet at the end of the war was about four times as many as before the war. Just what number she is laying off I do not know.

Mr. KITCHIN. What is her program for this year?

Mr. BUTLER. I believe that is completed—that is, the Hood. I believe that is about completed. As we understand it, England is not at this time beginning the construction of any great ships.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman recall approximately the amount of her appropriation for this year?

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] has those figures, and I will ask him to give them to the gentleman from North Carolina; but the amount is very much less. My recollection is that it will run from $180,000,000 to $225,000,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understood it was something over $400,000,000 for this year.

Mr. BUTLER. It is said that Great Britain has run far beyond the figure I have named, but upon an examination of the debates in Parliament we discovered that there are many things charged up against the Navy that will not necessarily go into either its construction or its direct maintenance; for instance, the merchant marine and a number of other things.

Mr. KITCHIN. What is the gentleman's understanding of the approximate amount of the appropriation this year for the Navy of France?

Mr. BUTLER. I regret that I am unable to give that.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman put it into his speech?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Also of Italy.

Mr. BUTLER. They are both of them very small.

I find on investigation that this information was not given to the committee and can not be procured immediately.

Mr. KITCHIN. May I ask the gentleman how many of the dreadnoughts and battle cruisers of our program of 1916 have been built?

Mr. BUTLER. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] will know that. I do not think one of them has been entirely completed.

Mr. KITCHIN. So I understand. For how many of them have the keels been laid?

Mr. BUTLER. I will have that information in a moment, and the percentages of construction.

Mr. KITCHIN. During the war, as I understand, and until after the armistice not a keel for a single dreadnought or battle cruiser was laid.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; I think they laid two.

Mr. KITCHIN. During the war?

Mr. BUTLER. I think that since we went into the war in 1917 we have made a small construction on two ships, that we have laid the keels and done a very little amount of work upon them.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I think it ought to be said in that connection, in answer to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], that while the keels may not have been laid or the work far advanced in cases where keels have been laid, yet great quantities of material had been fabricated and were on hand ready for the work of construction.

Mr. KITCHIN. But the real beginning of the construction was postponed until after the war.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I would not say that, because very many times the bulk of the work of construction is in fabricating the material and getting it ready.

Mr. KITCHIN. But the point I want to make is that our Navy Department built, or attempted to build, and complete during the war no dreadnoughts and battle cruisers, and rightly so, in my opinion. They engaged all their efforts and energies in building the smaller craft that we could build during and for use in the war.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I think that is correct.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think that was very wise.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman started to answer my question, but did not answer it.

Mr. BUTLER. I will answer it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WINGO. I will ask that the gentleman may have five minutes more, so that he may answer my question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. I should like to ask the gentleman, has the navy department of Great Britain taken the advice of Admiral Fisher so far as its program is concerned? He seemed to be under the impression that the dreadnought has become obsolete and should be a thing of the past—that the late war showed that it is obsolete.

Mr. BUTLER. I can not answer my friend's question. We do know this, that England has reduced her fighting force in the navy to 144,000 men, which is about one-half the force that she maintained prior to the Great War.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is it not a fact that in this year's building program Great Britain has not provided for any dreadnoughts?

Mr. BUTLER. That I believe to be so. Now, let me answer the question of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. If the gentleman will allow me, on page 1852 of the hearings Admiral Taylor details exactly the situation as to each one of the capital ships—the extent of their completion and all the other information.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, for another reference. In 1924 England will have, of the first and second line, 60 battleships and battle cruisers. America will have 47 ships of the first and second line, as Gov. KELLEY says, with those that are obsolete laid to one side. France will have 26, Japan 15, Italy 13, and, with the exception of another nation or two that may have a battleship or two, if these present programs are carried out, in 1924 there will be completed 154 first and second class ships of war, what we know as ships of the first and second line.

Mr. WINGO. I do not know whether the gentleman has made it clear or not that it will mean that the other nations will discard their obsolete ships, just as the United States has.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; that is what we expect.

Mr. WINGO. And the gentleman's figures are based on the theory that those will be the first and second line battleships up to that date, that by reason of age and otherwise will be in condition for practical service in the event of war?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes. Now, if the committee will give me their attention for a few minutes I will give them some figures.

Mr. CARSS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that when the program is completed our Navy will be greater than that of Great Britain?

Mr. BUTLER. No. I am giving my friend my best judgment of the figures. Some of my colleagues may not agree with me. Remember, in the next four years we will be putting out the most formidable array of battleships the world has ever seen or been able to construct, and they are all brand new with heavier guns, and therefore we will have to have less ships in number by reason of their superb efficiency and up-to-date preparation in every way. If it was given us to do we could match any Navy in the world. There is nothing to prepare armament for except to destroy human life. We have to reason in that way.

Mr. CARSS. For what purpose do we want to use this Navy?

Mr. BUTLER. Well, the gentleman is asking a question that the Almighty only can answer.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. In answer to the question asked by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] that France was building six vessels. Admiral Niblack corrected that. They were building six and two had progressed so far that they were going to complete them, and the others they were going to break up.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They could not get the steel for them.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Four out of the six they have abandoned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I would like to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania have such time as he wishes at this time.

Mr. BUTLER. No; I do not want to take any more time. My friend from Michigan refers to the statement of Admiral Niblack. France was building nine superdreadnoughts. She has seven built. She is building nine, and the tonnage is 240,150. That is official, and what Admiral Niblack has since said I do not have before me. I hope the subsequent statement, the one that was repeated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], is correct.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the Navy Department completed the execution of contracts for the completion of the 1916 program?

Mr. BUTLER. The contracts are made.

Mr. BANKHEAD. For all of the program of 1916?

Mr. BUTLER. To be entirely correct, some of the ships are being built in the navy yards. They are under construction, and the steel has been assembled. Much of it was prepared while we were in the war. These great cruisers are to be built by Government contracts. I understand it is impossible to obtain a bid on them, because their performance after being constructed, while all of the engineers vouch for it, is new to the contractors, and therefore they desire to take it on a cost-plus plan.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But the battleships are being constructed?

Mr. BUTLER. All of them are under contract or under construction in the navy yards, and therefore, having the atmosphere all about us surcharged with rumors and threats, it would seem wise that we should proceed with this program but add no other ships to it at this time.

Mr. HERSMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I will.

Mr. HERSMAN. I am informed that other countries building battleships are asking our Government to remit the interest on our loan for a few years. Does not the gentleman think it would be wise to consider that request in the light of their naval construction?

Mr. BUTLER. Well, I will say to the gentleman that is something with which I have nothing to do.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield for one question more?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. KITCHIN. I notice that of 10 battleships—dreadnoughts—provided for in the program of 1916 up to February 1 of this year, 6 were less than 7 per cent constructed. Two of the six had not been begun. Two of the six were only 5 per cent completed. Suppose we eliminated those four that have just been begun and two that have not been begun, how much less appropriation would your bill carry?

Mr. BUTLER. I will have it figured out. It would be considerably less. I will say to my friend I believe these great battle cruisers will cost the Government from $35,000,000 to $38,000,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. Something over $200,000,000 less.

Mr. BUTLER. But the gentleman must remember that we have the steel on hand for many of them.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from North Carolina suggests the percentage of completion of ships to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has referred.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in connection with the questions asked by the gentleman from North Carolina, whether it may not be possible that a larger percentage of the ships have been completed than he has stated when you take into account the amount of work done in the factories.

Mr. BUTLER. There is no doubt about it; we have paid for the material and the railroads have hauled it and laid it alongside the shipways.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will ask the gentleman another question: When will these six battleships to which I have referred be finished? Will the gentleman venture an opinion or guess at that?

Mr. BUTLER. I made the statement that they would be finished by 1924, but I guess they will be finished by the spring of 1925.

Mr. PADGETT. The battle cruisers are expected by that time?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. And the battleships a little earlier?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; a year earlier.

Mr. KITCHIN. If Great Britain has practically stopped building dreadnoughts, if France and Italy have stopped also, and if Germany has no dreadnoughts and is building none, and Russia is building none, does the gentleman think it is wise for us to continue to build these immense sea monsters that we call superdreadnoughts, costing $35,000,000 each?

Mr. BUTLER. I wish I had the time to go into a little reasoning with my good old friend, but I have not. If the nations of the world are to agree, and will keep their agreement, then no battleships of any kind will be needed; because, as I endeavored to show a moment ago, if the five great powers of the world get together—and four of them are already in agreement; their representatives will meet and go the first week of next month to Italy—and agree to reduce armament, then no battleships will be afloat at all, except perhaps here and there a ship in some of the countries of South America.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have listened to the debates in the House on the naval bills for 15 or 20 years, and as I very vividly recall, every year before the European war the reasons given for a big building program or for building these dreadnoughts and superdreadnoughts was that Germany and Japan, especially Germany, was building these dreadnoughts, and that other nations were building them, and that we had to build them as they built, that our program must go along with theirs; that we should not cease building them as long as Germany and other nations were building; that if they would stop building we would stop building, and if they continued to build we would continue to build. What I was getting at, and I know the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself think somewhat along the same lines on this subject and certainly have the same hopes, that sooner or later will come disarmament to a large extent throughout the world.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, yes; we have talked a great deal together, and I am willing that the gentleman should repeat what I have said.

Mr. KITCHIN. Inasmuch as Great Britain, France, Italy, Russia, and Germany have stopped building these dreadnoughts—or, at least, Great Britain is only putting down one—is it wise and is it economical for us to continue to build these 10 dreadnoughts and other dreadnoughts? Could we not wait until we get back to somewhat normal conditions and then see what these nations are going to do with respect to the dreadnaught question? The covenant of the League of Nations may force European nations to further disarmament, but certainly we should not anticipate that the nations are going to take up hereafter these big dreadnought-building programs, and will it not be wise for us to wait and see whether they are going to take them up again or not before appropriating hundreds of millions of dollars for such a program? If they did begin such programs in the future, would it not be then time enough for us to take it up again?

Mr. BUTLER. May I have the time to answer the gentleman? I do not want to take the time of this committee——

Mr. KITCHIN. I am asking for information.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman from North Carolina knows very well my views on such subjects, and I know his, because we oftentimes exchanged friendly observations upon that question. I can only answer the gentleman in this way: That I believe until the nations come to a better understanding and will agree to disarm, it is our duty to put up such armaments for the sea as will in every way protect us and care for us as against all the other nations if necessary. I say this only because I do not know what else to say; it is the only guide. I have never voted for a battleship in the 24 years that I have sat upon this committee that I did not consider one nation, and one alone; and that nation has no ships at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. For the first time in many years the only naval establishment and program in the world at all comparable with ours is that of England. No other navy or naval program is of a size or strength even remotely approaching ours. In fact, since the practical wiping out of the German Navy all the remaining navies and naval programs of the world, exclusive of England, do not equal ours.

In this situation it may be interesting to note the naval plans and programs of the only other nation possessing a navy of the first class and to compare briefly England's announced policy and expenditure with ours.

Admiral Niblack gave the Naval Affairs Committee some interesting and valuable information on this subject on February 14, but the latest information we have is contained in an Associated Press dispatch of March 20, day before yesterday.

According to this authority, the British Admiralty proposes to spend on the navy in the fiscal year 1920–21 the sum of £84,322,300, of which sum £23,000,000 is for the liquidation of terminal war expenses. On the basis of the normal rate of exchange, this means a total expenditure of a trifle less than $420,000,000 or about six millions less than carried in the bill. If, however, we reduce this by the sum of £23,000,000, or approximately $115,000,000, the amount proposed to be applied to the liquidation of terminal war expenses, we have $305,000,000 as the total of Great Britain's proposed expenditure directly on her navy.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I think to make the gentleman's statement perfectly accurate, attention ought to be called to the fact that the British had a separate air service and that their expenses for aviation would not be included in the gentleman's figures.

Mr. MONDELL. And $15,000,000 are carried in this bill for aviation development and experimentation and several millions for personnel and like expenditures in aviation.

This comparison does not, however, tell the story as accurately as a comparison based on the actual rate of exchange. Based on the current rate of $3.72 per pound, the proposed total naval expenditure amounts to about $321,000,000, and this reduced by the sum proposed for liquidation of terminal war expenses leaves the equivalent of approximately $241,000,000 as the total of Great Britain's expenditure for her navy compared with $425,000,000 carried in this bill. At this rate, our naval budget will exceed England's by $184,000,000.

Equally interesting is a comparison of the size and strength of the navy proposed to be retained in commission by the two countries. The enlisted strength of our Navy is fixed by law at 131,485, and the bill before us is based on an assumed average personnel of 120,000. Great Britain proposes a naval personnel of 136,000, and I assume that is the number contemplated by her estimates.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understood the chairman of the committee to say that England's present personnel was 180,000.

Mr. BUTLER. One hundred and forty-four thousand at this time.

Mr. MONDELL. The information that I have is from the dispatch that I have referred to, and the estimate there is fixed at 136,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman including the marine service in this?

Mr. MONDELL. I am including everything in this naval bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I mean so far as Great Britain is concerned.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The figures given do not include the British marine.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know as to the cost of the British marine service.

Mr. LONGWORTH. All I wanted to know was whether it was included in the figures the gentleman is giving here?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; it is.

SHIPS IN COMMISSION.

Admiral Robert E. Coontz, Chief of Naval Operations, in his statement before the Committee on Naval Affairs on January 15, gave a list of vessels which he believed should be kept in condition or in reserve or in reduced commission for the coming year, which included 17 dreadnoughts, 13 predreadnoughts, 8 armored cruisers, 18 cruisers, 133 submarines, 144 destroyers, and a formidable list of auxiliary ships, totaling 730, as follows:

Seventeen dreadnoughts.
Thirteen predreadnoughts.
Eight armored cruisers.
Eighteen cruisers.
Fourteen gunboats.
Eleven destroyer tenders.
Two mine layers.
Five submarine tenders.
Seven shore-based submarine tenders.
One hundred and thirty-three submarines.
Eight submarines in reserve.
One hundred and forty-four destroyers.
One hundred and fifty-four destroyers in reserve.
Twenty-one destroyers out of commission.
Fifty-five eagles.
Twenty-one mine sweepers.
Twelve mine sweepers for tugs.
Twelve mine sweepers in reserve.
Ten station craft.
Three fleet repair ships.
Two hospital ships.
Two hospital ships in reserve.
Six supply ships.
Two target repair ships.
One radio repair ship.
Eleven colliers.
Fourteen oilers with seven possible additional oilers.
Ten cargo ships.
Two transports.
Four aircraft tenders.
Two aircraft carriers.
Two ammunition ships.
Four survey tenders (approximate).

The admiral did not say just how much of this flotilla would be kept in active commission, but the list is very interesting in view of the full commissioned fleet of Great Britain as now proposed, according to the Associated Press dispatch above referred to. This is to consist of 16 battleships, 4 battle cruisers, 38 light cruisers, "with destroyers and submarines in proportion."

From the above it would seem, first, that our program of naval expenditure, as provided in this bill, exceeds that of Great Britain by about $5,000,000, if we figure the expenditure on the normal rate of exchange and including $115,000,000 of their expenditure which is said to be for the liquidation of terminal war expenses. If, however, the estimates are compared on the basis of present current rate of exchange and we still include Great Britain's expenditure for the liquidation of terminal war expenses, our proposed expenditure is approximately $100,000,000 above that of Great Britain. If from this we subtract the sum above referred to for the liquidation of terminal war expenses our proposed expenditure, based on the current rate of exchange, is practically $180,000,000 above the estimated expenditure of Great Britain.

Second. In the matter of personnel our estimates are intended to provide for 120,000 men as against 136,000 as the maximum for Great Britain.

Third. In the matter of the strength of the fleet in full commission the number of our contemplated line would seem to be 17 dreadnoughts, 13 predreadnoughts, 8 armored cruisers, 18 cruisers, and destroyers, submarines, and auxiliary vessels in proportion, as against 16 battleships, 4 battle cruisers, 38 light cruisers, with auxiliary ships in proportion, on the part of Great Britain.

This comparison, of course, can not be absolutely accurate, because, first, the British statement is not definite except as to the major ships, and the statement of Admiral Coontz, above referred to, relative to our naval strength may propose a larger flotilla in commission than above suggested. It is interesting, however, as indicating that the two navies in full commission were to be about equal.

As I have said, the only fleet with which we are in competition at all now is the fleet of England. We are building 10 dreadnoughts; she is building none. My understanding is that there is not a single dreadnought being constructed anywhere under the sun except the dreadnoughts we are building. England is not building a single capital ship, and she does not contemplate any. Italy has scrapped all of her contemplated dreadnoughts save one, and she is not working on that one because she has not the steel. France had a contemplated program including a number of dreadnoughts on none of which is she now working, and I do not know that they have entirely determined how many of them, if any, they will build. I think in this condition of affairs we may very well consider the suggestion made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] as to whether or no we should now continue our great dreadnought plan, which will cost us, if carried out as now contemplated, in addition to the $104,000,000 carried in this bill, something like $365,000,000 additional.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. If I have the time.

Mr. KAHN. I saw in the newspaper dispatches about two or three months ago an item from Tokyo to the effect that Japan was contemplating the building of eight superdreadnoughts of 40,000 tons each. Does the gentleman know anything about that?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, in the old days the "yellow peril" used to be waved and flaunted before us every time a naval bill was before us, but certainly that can not be done now with Japan's 4 dreadnoughts to our 17 and 10 building, and particularly at a time when Japan is having difficulty in getting the steel to build merchant ships. No; the time is past when the small navy of Japan can be used to urge an enlarged naval program here.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I agree with the gentleman in——

Mr. MONDELL. I have not the time.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does not the gentleman believe that we ought to reduce this $104,000,000 given to these uncompleted dreadnoughts in the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I think it is well to consider a reduction of it.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will offer an amendment, and I think it ought to be offered, I believe he will find a large support in the House.

Mr. MONDELL. I am not personally sufficiently informed to be able to say that that sum carried in this bill is too much. I am of the opinion that we might well somewhat reduce it, but I realize the committee has gone into the matter much more thoroughly than I.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a little bit of information, following up the statement made by the gentleman from Wyoming. According to the latest information we have from the department it is contemplated keeping in commission next year—if the gentleman from North Carolina will give me his attention, he is interested in this—it is contemplated keeping in commission next year many ships less than those originally estimated. I do not know whether I am violating any bit of confidence given me—I hope not, for I surely do not intend to do it—but I expect there will not be kept in full commission next year more than 17 great ships, 9 cruisers, 133 submarines, and 144 destroyers, with a corresponding number of smaller vessels—that is, in full commission; and that there will be in reduced commission—that is, with only 65 per cent of the full personnel—13 other big ships, 6 armored cruisers, 8 submarines in reserve, and 154 destroyers, with the remaining smaller vessels; and I think that this reduction in the number of ships to be kept in commission is due largely to the action of the Committee on Naval Affairs in reducing the personnel; because, if the new ships spoken of by the gentleman from Wyoming should be kept in commission, it would require almost every man we have provided for in this bill—in other words, 107,000 men at sea all the time. That is not contemplated.

Mr. KITCHIN. One minute. I would like to get some other information from the gentleman. The gentleman from Wyoming this morning said that the Committee on Naval Affairs and the Military Affairs Committee had, in reporting their bills, reduced the demands or estimates of appropriations from the departments about a billion dollars.

Mr. BUTLER. I intended coming to that, but I did not have the time; I did not say all I wanted to say.

Mr. KITCHIN. I desire to ask the gentleman another question. The Military Establishment asked for an Army of 504,000 men, and the bill passed the other day provided for 300,000 men, in round numbers. A difference, if you count $1,200 to a man, of $240,000,000, which was the so-called saving on the military bill. Now, in reference to the naval bill. Did not the Navy Department, after sending down its first estimate, go back and write to the gentleman's committee that it could cut the estimates at least $100,000,000 from the former estimate?

Mr. BUTLER. Is the gentleman asking me a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not write this report. It was written by a much better man.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not agree that it was written or could be written by a better man.

Mr. BUTLER. I only approved of it. I considered it absolutely fair. One of my colleagues who has worked hard on this bill, and I commend and thank him for the great work he has done in helping me and the rest of my colleagues, did write to the department—with reference to the views of the House as we understood them to be and our own views in particular—and asked whether the department could not further reduce its estimates, and the department did.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then the gentleman's committee, according to its report, reduced the estimates of the department $133,000,000, in round numbers. This added to the Military Committee reduction of $240,000,000 makes all together $373,000,000, so the difference between the amount stated by the gentleman from Wyoming and the actual fact is about $630,000,000.

I want to say this, that I congratulate the committee on reducing the naval appropriation bill, and I am for the reduction.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. After the heads of the bureaus had reduced the amount as indicated, the Secretary of the Navy sent supplemental estimates amounting to $73,000,000 more, which we took off. We reduced the estimates of the Secretary by $221,000,000.

Mr. BUTLER. We reduced it $222,341,680.80, and of that amount, as I understand it, $88,724,985 may be credited to the action of the department chiefs.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understood from your report, and I was just taking your report for it, that from the second estimates of the Navy Department you reduced in round numbers $133,000,000.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to say to my friend from North Carolina that I listened to his colloquy with the gentleman from Wyoming, and if this House sees fit to take the spine out of the Navy, the House will be responsible. We have done the best we could, but I only want my friend to think of it. I believe at this time it would be an awful mistake.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am inclined to follow the gentleman from Pennsylvania and his committee in naval matters.

Mr. BUTLER. We have done the very best we knew how.

Mr. KITCHIN. I believe that in this and the last year's bill this committee, under the leadership of its chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, has saved to the taxpayers of this country many tens of millions of dollars.

Mr. BUTLER. I believe in another year further reduction can be made, and I believe the reduction will run on.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] should offer an amendment to reduce the appropriation of $104,000,000 for the construction of these big dreadnoughts that have just about begun, and two that have not begun yet, I think it would be in the interest of economy and carry out the gentleman's economy program.

Mr. BUTLER. I think it would be wrong this year.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GREENE of Vermont having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed a joint resolution and bill of the following titles:

On March 19, 1920:

H. J. Res. 194. Joint resolution amending joint resolution extending the time for payment of purchase money on homestead entries in the former Colville Indian Reservation, Wash.; and

H. R. 9023. An act to give effect to certain provisions of the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names, made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires, in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, and for other purposes.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

I trust that my very dear friend from Pennsylvania, the distinguished chairman of the committee, for whom I have great respect and also affectionate regard, will not consider that I was making any reference to him when I asserted that the table from which he is reading was altogether incorrect. It is true that Admiral Niblack did furnish a table in which, among other things, it was stated that nine big dreadnoughts were building for France. It is also true that later Admiral Niblack stated that four of those forms for the dreadnoughts, so far as they had got them started, were scrapped, torn down, and that there were only two left on the ways; that the building program that France was actually carrying on—and you will find this on page 846 of the hearings—"is six light cruisers, 4,500 tons displacement, and six destroyers of 2,000 tons displacement." That is the building program in France instead of constructing any battleships. My statement was absolutely correct when I said that neither England, France, nor Italy were building a solitary battleship; by that I mean going on with the construction at this time of a single battleship.

The official report of the British Admiralty, recently made, shows that they do not contemplate having a fleet——

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield to me for one question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman know the date of Admiral Niblack's information, and does the gentleman know that since France contemplated canceling that program the alliance has declined to allow them the ships that were captured from Germany? In other words, when they thought the ships from Germany would come into the French fleet they proposed to cancel the construction. What have they done since they have taken the German ships away from France?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I know as a practical proposition it is impossible for France to get the material or the money to go on with these ships, and its program for merchant ships, and I base it on the Navy's own statement.

Mr. WINGO. On what does the gentleman base his statement that it is impossible for France to get steel when she has control of the second largest supply of raw material in the world for producing steel?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does not the gentleman realize that we were furnishing steel to France during the war?

Mr. WINGO. Since the war; and taking the iron and coal deposits that France gets under the peace treaty, the gentleman would not contend that France would be deficient in steel for a hundred years?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman mean to say that he has any information that these fields are started in full operation and production, and that France has not need, and urgent need, for all the steel she can get for peace purposes?

Mr. WINGO. The information I get is this——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am sorry I can not yield any more.

Mr. WINGO. I would suggest to the gentleman for his own information that he can find——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will pardon me, I have looked up all these matters very carefully. Steel can not be made without coal and France is woefully short of coal. She can not fully light her streets or heat her houses. There has been great suffering in France this winter for that reason.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman will find he is very much in error on the present economic condition of France, from the reports of her own officials.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman is not satisfied with Admiral Niblack's statement that France's building program is six light cruisers and six destroyers, I will let it go at that. I make no statement to the House, and never have, that I am not able to support by authority that is usually considered unquestioned.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has any information as to whether or not the pay of the personnel of the English and French Navies has been raised since the war?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I can not state as to that. The gentleman from Wyoming correctly gave the personnel of the English Navy. The English program is for a postwar fleet of 16 battleships, 4 battle cruisers, 38 light cruisers, with destroyers and submarines in proportion. I think that is about the fleet we would have to-day if we could get the men. Whether we can get them or not is a question.

I would like to find out as the debate proceeds what our Navy officials are doing as to scrapping our old ships. England went so far as to scrap three battle cruisers that were partially constructed of the same type as the great ship Hood, of which the chairman of the Naval Committee spoke, a magnificent battle cruiser which she has since completed and has since crossed the ocean to this country. It is a splendid ship of the latest type—the last word in the construction of great fighting ships, for the Hood is a 43,000-ton vessel. But three other sister ships of the same size, that were already started, and on which considerable work had been done, were scrapped.

That building program of great battleships was entirely abandoned by England. France did the same thing with its superdreadnought program; she actually scrapped four superdreadnoughts upon which she had already done considerable work. That is also found in Admiral Niblack's testimony. There is only one country from which I have been able to get reliable information, and that is Japan. I am not able to state what Japan is doing.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. I regret I did not hear the beginning of the gentleman's address. The gentleman has been able to find out that the building program had stopped. What is the reason?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would like to have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAZARO. I merely want to get at the bottom of it. Have they discovered something new and better that will displace these battleships?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will come to that later. Many distinguished authorities believe that the development of aircraft and submarines has or will make battleships obsolete. England has not only scrapped new battleships partly constructed but she has consigned to the scrap heap all her predreadnought types. We have a number in commission that I suppose will be preserved, but they are absolutely useless, and not able to contend with the superdreadnoughts that have been constructed since. We ought to effect a great reduction in our naval expense by scrapping these useless ships also.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, under the bill passed by this Congress in July last for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, there was appropriated $613,246,838.88. The bill reported by the committee for 1921, and now under consideration, carries an appropriation of only $425,289,574, showing a net decrease from the bill passed by this same Congress in July last of $187,957,264.88. I will later discuss this difference between the July, 1919, bill and the present bill under certain topical heads and point out the main items constituting the difference between the two bills. Suffice it to now say that the decrease of $187,000,000, in round figures, is due largely to the small enlisted personnel now in the Navy as compared with the number appropriated for in the last bill and to the elimination of an emergency repair fund for a large number of vessels since returned to private owners and the pay of reservists, both of which last items are eliminated from the present bill. Before discussing these differences more in detail may I refer for the moment to the $104,000,000 carried in this bill for new construction? This simply provides a fund for continuing the 1916 building program—no new construction, in fact. There had been expended on the ships of the 1916 building program up to July 1, 1919, $114,000,000, and there was made available for this purpose for the present fiscal year, ending June 30, 1920, $159,000,000. There will remain due on the 1916 building program, after the expenditure of $104,000,000 now carried herein for 1921, the sum of $294,600,000, and our committee is informed that the department will ask that $125,000,000 of this sum be carried in the 1922 bill, about $120,000,000 in the 1923 bill, and the balance, to wit, $99,600,000 in the 1924 bill.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman's calculation is, I think, in error. I think we would have expended $160,000,000.

Mr. OLIVER. We had expended $114,000,000 on July 1, 1919, and there was available for expenditure for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, $159,000,000.

Mr. PADGETT. There was in February $48,000,000 of the $159,000,000 still available for the balance of this fiscal year.

Mr. WINGO. This sum of $104,000,000 is in addition to the $159,000,000?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. At the conclusion of this fiscal year we estimate that $160,000,000 will have been expended.

Mr. OLIVER. To be exact, $159,000,000 plus $114,000,000 expended prior to July 1, 1919.

Mr. WINGO. What has this $160,000,000 spent consisted of, fabricated steel and parts?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, partly; and also the partial completion of many of the ships. The percentage of completion can be found by referring to the hearings, the page of which was given a few minutes ago by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

I wish to now take up the increased amount, to wit, $187,957,264.88 carried in the bill passed by this Congress last July over the amount carried in the bill now under consideration. That reduction is largely due to the fact that the enlisted personnel of the Navy has been greatly reduced, and that the great number of ships used by the Navy during the war, to wit, more than 2,000, has now been reduced to something in excess of 900. In the July last bill we appropriated for an average of 181,000 enlisted men; in this bill we are only appropriating for 120,000 enlisted men. Under "Pay, miscellaneous," last July we appropriated $4,500,000. This bill carries under that item only $3,500,000. The department, however, is strenuously insisting that this item should be raised to $4,632,000, and likely will request the Senate committee to give this increase, if now denied by the House.

For contingent Navy in the July bill there was carried $150,000; the present bill only carries $75,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER. For the Virgin Islands the present bill carries an increase of $143,440. This is in accord with the recommendation of the special committee recently sent by Congress to the islands.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand that it is the settled policy of the Navy Department, without regard to the view of Congress expressed in appropriation bills, to proceed to expend money and come back with the expectation that Congress will give them as deficiencies moneys that it has refused to give in the original appropriation bills? Is that the theory and purpose?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not so understand.

Mr. MONDELL. If it is, they are likely to be very greatly disappointed.

Mr. OLIVER. In reply to the gentleman's statement, I feel sure that such is not the policy of the department, but it has been the endeavor of this committee to ascertain, as nearly as possible, whether the amounts we have allowed will be sufficient to care for the needs of the Navy. The department is authorized to create certain deficiencies, and I understand that the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts has a deficiency for this year amounting to seventeen or twenty millions dollars for fuel and transportation, and that unless the appropriation carried in this bill is increased a like deficiency for these items will occur in 1921.

Continuing the comparison between the two bills, you will find that aviation has been reduced $10,000,000; the Consulting Board, $10,000,000; the Bureau of Navigation, from $22,400,950 to $6,340,950; the Bureau of Ordnance, from $29,625,000 to $17,925,000; the Bureau of Yards and Docks, about $1,000,000; Public Works, about $2,500,000; the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, about $7,000,000; pay of the Navy, about $44,000,000; Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, about $25,000,000; Bureau of Construction and Repair, about $1,000,000; Bureau of Steam Engineering, about $2,000,000; Marine Corps, about $16,000,000; increase of Navy, about $29,000,000; also items carried in the July bill for an emergency fund and pay of reservists, amounting to about $24,000,000, have been eliminated from the present bill, since the return of many ships to private owners and the reduction in the enlisted personnel make it unnecessary to carry these items longer. Thus it clearly appears that the $187,000,000 decrease is really due to the large reduction in personnel and in the ships of the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks for unanimous consent that his time be extended for three minutes longer. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER. Allusion has been made to the fact that this bill carries $133,616,695.80 less than the Secretary of the Navy recommended in his revised estimates. The Secretary of the Navy, in response to a letter from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY], submitted a revised estimate for 1921 of $484,406,269.80, and orally recommended in addition for new ship construction about $65,000,000. The difference between the amount so recommended by him and the amount carried in the bill consists, it will be found, largely of these items: $65,000,000 for new ship construction, and a cut of about $11,000,000 for personnel, and about $20,000,000 for certain naval base improvements, including more than $1,000,000 for San Francisco Harbor. The difference, it will be seen, is really in deferred appropriations, since unquestionably we must next year provide for a larger personnel if the Navy is enlisted to its full strength and if we provide the type of ships now strongly recommended by the General Board.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Has the gentleman stated the total carried by the bill?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes; about $425,000,000, as against last year's bill of $618,000,000. I have tried to point out how the reductions occur and the reasons therefor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, a few minutes ago the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] made some inquiries about the condition of the Army and the Army appropriations.

The War Department submitted estimates to the Committee on Military Affairs both for the present fiscal year and for the coming fiscal year, based upon an Army of 576,000 officers and men and carrying a total appropriation of $989,000,000.

The reorganization bill which was passed by the House a few days ago fixes the total enlisted strength of the Army at 299,000 and the officer personnel at 17,832.

It is exceedingly unlikely that the total number of enlisted men will be secured for some years to come, if at all. At the present time the figures show that we have an enlisted personnel in the Army of about 221,000. The chances are that that number will be materially reduced by the beginning of the next fiscal year, because the War Department started out on the 16th of January on an intensive drive to secure 84,000 enlistments. They made a special effort to secure that many men to fill up the units that they desired to fill up. Up to the present, during that intensive drive, they have secured only about 14,000 enlistments, and if that same condition prevails during the entire fiscal year 1921 I doubt whether the War Department will be able to secure more than an average of 175,000 enlisted men during that fiscal year.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. To what is that attributable?

Mr. KAHN. To the large salaries and wages that men can secure in private employment. The Congress has fixed the wage of the enlisted man. He gets $30 a month on his initial enlistment. In private life he can get anywhere from $4 to $12 a day, and he is not going to enlist for the paltry sum that the Government is paying at the present time.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know that the gentleman stated it, but what does it cost the Army per soldier per year?

Mr. KAHN. The War Department has informed me that at the present time it costs about $1,600 a year for every soldier in the Army. During the war it was over $2,000, and previous to the war it was about $1,000. As the cost of the ration and the cost of clothing and other commodities that the soldier is compelled to use goes down, of course the cost of the individual soldier will be materially reduced.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Are there any other causes than the mere question of finance, any moral causes or sentimental causes that diminish the number of enlistments?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am afraid that there is.

Mr. KAHN. Let me say to the gentleman that immediately after the war a great many young men who had been in the Army for a brief period concluded that they would like to enlist for one year additional, and so we had something like 89,000 one-year enlistments, from March 1, 1919, to March 1, 1920. We had about 82,000 three-year enlistments. But we are told by the recruiting service that of the 89,000 one-year enlistments probably not 30 per cent will reenlist for three years.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE. Has not experience demonstrated that the average American youth does not care to enlist in a time of peace, and is it not a fact that at no time in our history have we had enough enlistments to come up to the strength authorized by law?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman's statement is absolutely correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California.

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Has there been any actual decrease in the cost of each man per year since the war ceased?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; during the war the actual cost of each man was over $2,000. It is $1,600 a man now. So that there has been a material decrease.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is that what it is now, or what you are counting that it will be?

Mr. KAHN. That is what it is now; that is what the War Department has stated to me. The total saving in my opinion on the estimate of the War Department and what the Committee on Military Affairs will ask appropriations for on the annual appropriation bill, will approximate in my opinion over $400,000,000. So that we will make a very material saving on that one bill alone.

The situation in the Military Establishment is rather unfortunate. The officers are seeking increased pay because of the high cost of living. Congress has done nothing for them in that regard, and there is more or less demoralization in the service. I want to say in closing, that a few days ago I read the speech of Winston Churchill in the British Parliament delivered on the 23d of February, 1920.

He was speaking on the military estimates for the fiscal year 1920–21. He stated to the House of Commons that the prewar cost of the army was approximately £28,000,000 for 220,000 men. He stated further that Great Britain proposes in the coming fiscal year to reduce her army to the prewar status, but that the cost of the same number of men has increased to £63,000,000. So that the same experience that we are having in the United States regarding the increased cost of the Military Establishment is equally true in Great Britain. I thought the House would desire to have that information.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. In view of the questions that have been asked and the information the gentleman has given, does the gentleman consider it wise for his committee, as reported by the newspapers, to be agitating the matter of compulsory training, which the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] told us on Saturday would cost five hundred or seven hundred million dollars a year?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know where the gentleman from Wyoming gets his figures, but I believe you can materially reduce the cost of maintaining your Regular Army if you will train the citizenry of the country. But I do not desire to discuss that matter now. I hope some day to go into that at considerable length and considerable detail, but in view of my limited time I do not want to discuss it at present.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to this situation, that we are carrying on this debate by unanimous consent largely. May I ask the gentleman to make his motion.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will yield, I want two minutes. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is still pending.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California has enlightened the House, and I thank him for it. He has given me much information that I desired to have. I asked him when he made his speech to give us clearly such information.

He states that each soldier costs $1,600 a year for the Government to maintain. I am sure that he is right about it. This leads me to congratulate myself on the fact that on the Army bill I voted against an Army of 300,000 men provided for therein and voted in favor of limiting the Regular Army to 185,000 men. That was a saving of $184,000,000. In other words, I want to remind my good friend from Wyoming, Mr. MONDELL, the distinguished majority leader, that in the vote on the Army bill I voted to relieve the taxpayers of this country, who are now paying taxes high enough, of $184,000,000 a year more than he voted for. I want him to give me credit for economy, for saving the taxpayers on that one vote $184,000,000 more than he did. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Some time hereafter, when I can get sufficient time, I think I can show the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming that I have already on appropriations this session voted for $1,500,000,000 less to be taken from the taxpayers of the country than he has during this session. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I think I can show him that if the bills that he has introduced were to be passed and he voted for his own bills, as I would vote against them, I would be voting to save the people $2,100,000,000 more than the gentleman from Wyoming, the majority leader of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am going to take some little time hereafter, if the House will hear me, in going into the details about this "economy program" of this Republican House, and to compare the vote of myself and the majority of the Democrats on this side with the vote of the leading economist of this House, the gentleman from Wyoming, the distinguished majority leader. I want to say, however, that he is trying his best to economize but does not know economy when he sees it.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAY, MISCELLANEOUS.

For commissions and interest; transportation of funds; exchange; mileage to officers of the Navy and Naval Reserve Force while traveling under orders in the United States, and for actual personal expenses of officers of the Navy and Naval Reserve Force while traveling abroad under orders, and for traveling expenses of civilian employees, and for mileage, at 5 cents per mile, to midshipmen entering the Naval Academy while proceeding from their homes to the Naval Academy for examination and appointment as midshipmen; for actual traveling expenses of female nurses; actual expenses of officers while on shore patrol duty; hire of launches or other small boats in Asiatic waters; for rent of buildings and offices not in navy yards; expenses of courts-martial, prisoners and prisons, and courts of inquiry, boards of inspection, examining boards, with clerks, and witnesses' fees, and traveling expenses and costs; expenses of naval defense districts; stationery and recording; religious books; newspapers and periodicals for the naval service; all advertising for the Navy Department and its bureaus (except advertising for recruits for the Bureau of Navigation); copying, ferriage; tolls, costs of suits; commissions, warrants, diplomas, and discharges; relief of vessels in distress; recovery of valuables from shipwrecks; quarantine expenses; reports; professional investigation; cost of special instruction abroad, including maintenance of students and attachés: Provided, That this appropriation and the appropriation "Pay, Marine Corps," shall be available for special allowances for maintenance to officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps serving under unusual conditions; information from abroad and at home, and the collection and classification thereof; all charges pertaining to the Navy Department and its bureaus for ice for the cooling of drinking water on shore (except at naval hospitals), telephone rentals and tolls, telegrams, cablegrams, and postage, foreign and domestic, and post-office box rentals; and other necessary and incidental expenses: Provided further, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for clerical, inspection, and messenger service in navy yards and naval stations, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, shall not exceed $1,000,000, and for necessary expenses for the interned persons and prisoners of war under the jurisdiction of the Navy Department, including funeral expenses for such interned persons or prisoners of war as may die while under such jurisdiction, claims for damages under naval act approved July 11, 1919; in all $3,550,000.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 2, at the end of line 10 and beginning on line 11, by striking out the words "and Naval Reserve Force."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, after the word "Navy," in line 10, strike out the words "and Naval Reserve Force."

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, later I intend to offer an amendment at another place in the bill to cover the question that I desire to raise, but I think these words should be stricken out at this place. I desire at this time to explain my reason for this amendment. Last year in the appropriation bill there was a clause which provided that in an emergency the President under certain conditions might provide for the calling of the reserve force, with their consent, but the bill contained this further clause:

That during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, no member of the Naval Reserve Force shall be recalled to active duty for training or any other purpose except as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I think I know what the gentleman wants to do over further, but I can not understand what he wants to do here. If he strikes out these words, he could not get the officers home who have their discharge from the Navy.

Mr. DOWELL. That may be. I said I desired to explain what I intend to do later, and I make this motion at this time, to call attention of the committee to the condition of the Naval Reserve Force.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Then the gentleman intends to withdraw this amendment?

Mr. DOWELL. I do not intend to press it at this time, provided I may have the opportunity of presenting another amendment later on. Here is the situation: The appropriation act which ends on June 30, 1920, precludes the calling of the reserve force. Under the present bill there is provision for paying the expenses of the reserve force and for recalling them into the service. I have received a number of letters from boys in the reserve force announcing that, anticipating the adoption of this bill, the Navy Department has already issued a call directing these men to report on the 1st day of July—the morning following the expiration of the appropriation in the law under which they are now operating. I have a number of letters from those who have been recalled to the service and I want to call attention to one or two of them in order that gentlemen may understand the situation in which these young men are placed. I have a letter here that I want to read, a very brief one:

My son, who is in the Naval Reserves, has been called back to the Navy for July 1. He is married and living on a farm, and I would consider it a great favor if you would have this postponed.

This man is not even asking that his boy be relieved from being returned, but he is asking that it be postponed until he can get through with his harvest. I have another letter from a widow who has a son in the reserves, who is being called to the service, whose crops have not yet been cared for.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman is speaking of the members of the Naval Reserve, is he not?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. I took occasion to look that up the other day, and I will say to the gentleman that there is no law whereby they can compel attendance.

Mr. DOWELL. I understand, but they have undertaken to do what they are not permitted to do.

Mr. KNUTSON. The commander of the Great Lakes district is directing them to attend.

Mr. DOWELL. Yes; and here is the language that is used in the call. I quote it from a gentleman who has given me the language used:

The letter states that we are required by law to have at least 30 drills per year, beginning July 1, 1920.

This young man doubts the truth of that, but says that he is required to appear. I quote from another letter:

We have recently been advised by the commander that all reserves would be required to devote at least two weeks to the service.

The letters have been sent out anticipating the passage of this bill, because under the bill, which expires on the 30th of June next, they are not permitted to call any reserves; but on the day following, mark you—and this is March—they have already issued the order to appear on the morning of July 1. I call attention to the language used by the naval officer, and I ask the gentleman from New York, Mr. HICKS, if he will loan to me for a few moments, that I may have it read, the telegram that he received from the commander of the Great Lakes station.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOWELL. This is an important matter, or I would not take up the time of the committee.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. When the gentleman from Iowa spoke of this matter I took it up at once with the Bureau of Navigation, because I felt that it was such an important matter that it should be investigated. May I have a little of the gentleman's time?

Mr. DOWELL. If the gentleman takes any time I shall have to ask for more. Here is what happened, and then I want to have the telegram read. I asked the gentleman to wire to the Great Lakes station. He did not believe my statement was correct. He wired to the station and I am asking if he will permit the reply he received to be read now?

Mr. HICKS. I will do that.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman send it up to the Clerk's desk?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Iowa whether or not that may be deferred until we get to the part of the bill that bears directly upon it?

Mr. HICKS. This is the place where the reserve comes in, and I desire to present it here.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Wait until the telegram is read. I yield.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether or not I understood him. Is he referring to a young man who enlisted in the Naval Reserve?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. When they sign the contract they understand they probably might be called into training. Now, is the gentleman from Iowa seeking to have it put in the power of that young man who entered the Naval Reserves to say when he shall go and take that training?

Mr. DOWELL. No. I will answer the gentleman this way: When that young man went to enlist in the Navy he did just as the man who went in the Army. He enlisted for the duration of the war. He was doing a patriotic duty. When he went there they asked him to enlist for four years, which he did, and which he was compelled to do, and they told him he would be released when the war was over, but he was not released; he was sent home and released from active service only. Now, you are seeking to do what you can not do in any other way—you are seeking to compel him to return and serve in the Navy after the war is ended. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I take it that what the gentleman wants to do is to provide in this bill that the reserves shall not be called into active training?

Mr. DOWELL. I want to prevent the Navy Department from now drafting men in the service who enlisted for the war.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The appropriation for that purpose is on page 27 of the bill.

Mr. DOWELL. Yes, sir. I understand that, and I intend to offer an amendment. I made this amendment for the purpose of bringing this matter to the attention of the committee, because I want all of them to know what the Navy Department is doing with reference to the reserve force.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. When we reach page 27 the gentleman intends to offer an amendment?

Mr. DOWELL. I intend to offer another amendment.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. And the gentleman is going to withdraw this amendment he has offered?

Mr. DOWELL. I will see about that. I want to read this telegram.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is an entirely different question.

Mr. DOWELL. This is from the commander of the Great Lakes station:

GREAT LAKES, ILL., March 18, 1920.

Hon. F. C. HICKS,
House of Representatives, Washington:

In accordance with telegram of yesterday, letter mailed you last night giving all details; no orders sent calling reserves to training in July. Circular letter sent stating that training would be (required) after July 1; the trouble arose from the use of the word "(required)." Drills are required in order that the men may draw retainers' pay in confirmed ratings; copies of letters requested mailed last night and this will explain everything.

F. W. BASSETT,
Rear Admiral, United States Navy.

Where is the other telegram——

Mr. HICKS. That is the only telegram I received.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. May I ask for five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUTLER. Before the gentleman begins, may I ask that all debate upon this amendment close at the end of five minutes, the time to be occupied by the gentleman from Iowa?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes, to be given to the gentleman from Iowa. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, all through this bill there are provisions for the recall of the reserve force of the Navy. It is the intention of the Navy Department to recall these boys immediately after July 1 when this bill takes effect, and under the circumstances we should enact an amendment here that will prevent the Navy Department from drafting these men, as they will have the right to do, if we permit this bill to pass without amendment. In the first place, as I understand it, it is the purpose of the Navy Department to call a number of these men, perhaps for only two weeks, and pay the expense of traveling from one coast to the other. A number of them I know were transferred to many stations during the war.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield there for a question? Does the gentleman think they should receive compensation unless they comply with the training and drill as the act requires?

Mr. DOWELL. Why, certainly not. They are not entitled to the pay unless they perform the service. But what I want to do is to prevent the Navy Department from calling these men back into the service.

Mr. PADGETT. Then, the gentleman desires to prevent them from paying them?

Mr. DOWELL. That is not the question I am discussing.

Mr. BUTLER. The act of Congress provided they shall be paid in advance. They are paid what is called retainer pay. That is part of the condition under the contract—that they will go back and train. This is not compulsory. They can pay back the retainer pay and escape the obligation.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not a good deal cheaper for them to remain on the farm or in the factory where they now are than for the Government to pay the expense of their travel across the continent two or three times?

Mr. BUTLER. Tell the young man to write to them and send back the retainer pay and resign from the service.

Mr. DOWELL. I want to say to the gentleman these boys want to be released, and that is why I am complaining here, because the department is attempting to do what it could not do if these boys were not already in the service.

Mr. PADGETT. If the gentleman will permit, the Secretary of the Navy stated before the Committee on Naval Affairs that he had accepted the resignation of every man in the reserve who wanted to get out.

Mr. DOWELL. I do not know about that recently, but I do know that some of these boys do want to get out of the service and they are not released. I withdraw the motion for the present, and will offer an amendment at another place in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Aviation, Navy: For aviation, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for procuring, producing, constructing, operating, preserving, storing, and handling aircraft, establishment and maintenance of aircraft stations, for experimental work in development of aviation for naval purposes, and for the purchase or manufacture and issue of special clothing, wearing apparel, and similar equipment for aviation purposes, $15,876,000, to be expended as follows: For necessary aircraft, $3,464,400; for necessary equipment for heavier-than-air and lighter-than-air craft, $300,000; to continue authorized construction of one rigid airship, $1,500,000; for new construction at stations, $1,257,000; for new equipment for training, $100,000; for maintenance and operation of aircraft factory, helium plant, aircraft stations, fleet activities, testing laboratories, and for overhauling of planes, $6,044,600; for continuing experiments and development work for all types of aircraft, $2,935,000; for pay of classified force, $275,000; and the money herein specifically appropriated for "Aviation" shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law as "Aviation" and for that purpose shall constitute one fund: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for drafting, clerical, inspection, and messenger service for aircraft stations shall not exceed $275,000: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to consider, ascertain, adjust, determine, and pay out of this appropriation the amounts due on claims for damages which have occurred or may occur to private property growing out of the operations of naval aircraft, where such claim does not exceed the sum of $500: Provided further, That all claims adjusted under this authority during any fiscal year shall be reported in detail to the Congress by the Secretary of the Navy: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for maintenance of more than six heavier-than-air stations on the coasts of continental United States: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the construction of a factory for the manufacture of aeroplanes.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VENABLE: Page 5, line 10, after the word "Navy," strike out the paragraph and insert:

"For aviation, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for procuring, producing, constructing, operating, preserving, storing, and handling aircraft, establishment and maintenance of aircraft stations, for experimental work in development of aviation for naval purposes, and for the purchase or manufacture and issue of special clothing, wearing apparel, and similar equipment, for aviation, $25,000,000: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for drafting, clerical, inspection, and messenger service for aircraft stations shall not exceed $275,000: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to consider, ascertain, adjust, determine, and pay out of this appropriation the amounts due on claims for damages which have occurred or may occur to private property growing out of the operations of naval aircraft, where such claim does not exceed the sum of $500: Provided further, That all claims adjusted under this authority during any fiscal year shall be reported in detail to the Congress by the Secretary of the Navy: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for maintenance of more than six heavier-than-air stations on the coast of continental United States: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the construction of a factory for the manufacture of aeroplanes."

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on Friday last I discussed at some length the reasons why I believe there should be an increase in the appropriation for naval aviation and why the very widest latitude should be given the Department of the Navy in the expenditure of this money. My amendment undertakes to accomplish the purposes which I think should be accomplished, and I have retained the provisos which now appear in the bill.

The reasons which I assign for my position may be summed up in the statement that naval aviation is now in an experimental stage; that the best opinion and information which we can get upon the subject is that the development of aviation may change completely the types of ships and their characteristics and that it may render not necessarily obsolete but largely ineffective the present types of large vessels which we are building. It seemed to me, then, as a matter of pure economy, that the wise thing to do is to find out at the earliest possible moment the possibilities of naval aviation and the bearing which that development will have on naval construction. We are now paying about $35,000,000 for large battleships and battle cruisers. So it seemed to me that the wise thing to do would be to be liberal with the Navy Department with funds that they may carry on, in an extensive way, experimental work, and, being experimental work, it is necessarily based upon the idea that there will be a constant change in method and experiment. If you are to have an effective experiment it is best not to tie the hands of the men who are conducting the experiment by saying, "You shall spend so much money for this item and so much money for that, and so much for the other," because by so doing you necessarily limit the freedom of experiment, with the result, of course, that the best results can not be obtained. I am in thorough accord with the general policy of having the Congress itemize appropriations. I am in thorough sympathy with that as a general rule and policy, but it can not be applied and should not be applied to a subject matter which confessedly is experimental. And the bill as drawn puts us in the attitude of saying to these men—and we know nothing about aviation—"You are the men who have to carry on the experiments"——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. VENABLE. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VENABLE. We say to these men, "You must conduct your experiments according to this way," when "this way" is the way of a layman who knows nothing about it. Now, it may be replied that when these naval gentlemen were told that the committee was going to itemize, they sat down and gave these items themselves. Of course they did, because they were told we were going to itemize the appropriation, and they made the best case that was possible. But it does not follow at all that that is the best method by which to proceed.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman agrees that this entire matter is largely an experimental problem?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does he not think that $15,000,000 is a large amount of money with which to experiment in one year?

Mr. VENABLE. Not with a thing as important as aviation; not with a thing as costly as aviation. And I feel toward that very much like I do toward a good many things with which we have to deal in the Naval Committee. We confessedly do not know about these technical subjects or the technical phases of them, and we must, perforce, rely more or less upon the judgment of the men who have technical training, not on the ground that mistakes will not be made, for they will; not on the ground that money will not be wasted, for some it probably will, but that is the best opinion we can get.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, and I do so with some reluctance.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE], who is fully informed, has been consistent in his advocacy of a larger appropriation for aviation, and in many ways I concur in the opinions he has expressed. The Naval Affairs Committee in discussing this matter of aviation were confronted with several facts, and we arrived at our figure of $15,876,000, not because of lack of faith in aviation, not because of lack of confidence in the officers who are directing aviation, but because we sincerely and honestly felt that at the present time, with aviation to a large extent in an experiment stage, and with the Federal Treasury depleted, this Congress was not justified in increasing the amount more than we have stated in the bill, namely, $15,876,000. In passing, let me pay my sincere respects to Capt. Craven, head of naval aviation, an officer of great ability and sound judgment.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HICKS. Yes; gladly.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman state to the committee how much time he has devoted to the study of aviation in the last three or four months?

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, my personal interest has been great, but my knowledge has been negligible. It has been an interesting matter for me to do the little I have done, but I do not want my personal opinion to weigh one iota with this committee.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman has not answered my question. How much time has the gentleman devoted to the special study of aviation in the last three or four months?

Mr. HICKS. Well, it has been so insignificant in proportion to the importance of the question that I do not care to mention it.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman is modest. I will state that it has been at least three months of the most careful study and consideration, and that the Committee on Naval Affairs is deeply indebted to him for his work.

Mr. HICKS. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman state how much money is carried in this bill for aviation in addition to what is carried in this paragraph?

Mr. HICKS. Yes; in a moment. I am going to speak, Mr. Chairman, of aviation, and in case anyone desires to interrogate me somewhat in detail I ask permission to speak for five minutes additional in order to cover the points I may wish to refer to. I have not taken any time of the committee in general debate, and I will be glad to answer questions that may be propounded. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes additional at the end of my five minutes allowed under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, when this item was presented to the committee it carried $47,000,000 in the estimates. Then the Secretary of the Navy arbitrarily cut that down to $35,000,000. Then, under persuasion, that was cut down to $31,000,000, and then, under more persuasion, it was cut to $25,000,000, and finally the committee brought forward this bill with the amount fixed at a little under $16,000,000.

Now, what are we proposing to do with this amount of money? We all realize the importance of aviation, not only from the military standpoint, but also as a factor in peace-time activities. We all have confidence in it; but, my colleagues, aviation, while not experimental, is largely without a definite, fixed program on the part either of the Army or of the Navy.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HICKS. I yield.

Mr. VENABLE. How in the world is it going to progress beyond the experimental stage, and how in the world are we going to form definite plans except by experimenting with the subject matter and learning more about it?

Mr. HICKS. My friend from Mississippi knows, I think, that $16,000,000 is a large amount to spend when a large part of it is for experimental work. Every new type airplane or balloon that we send into the air is practically an experiment. Aviation is getting into its stride, but as yet it has not struck its gait.

Now, I am going to take up, just for a few minutes, something that has happened on the other side of the water. We have been urged here in this country time and time again to raise the appropriation for aviation because Great Britain was spending vast sums of money on her aviation program. Now, it matters not to us what Great Britain may do or may not do, but merely to show that those articles were sensational and not founded on fact I am going to give you some statements presented by Mr. Winston Churchill, the head of the air ministry of Great Britain. Great Britain for this year appropriated $216,000,000 for aviation. When I say "$216,000,000," I am interpreting the pound sterling as $4 to the pound, merely for the sake of easy reckoning. We must not forget that aviation in Great Britain embraces the army, the navy, and all civilian activities, for they have a combined or united service. Where did that $216,000,000 go? All except $60,000,000 was for war contracts and for work the direct result of the war, and not one dollar above the $60,000,000 was for future development of aviation. That vast sum was all represented by water that had gone under the wheel.

Now, what does Great Britain ask for this year—$60,000,000, of which $8,000,000 is to be used for civilian aviation and experimental work; and let me remind you again that in Great Britain aviation covers all branches—the army, navy, and civilian. In view of this statement I do not think anyone can accuse us of being niggardly toward aviation.

Let me quote a paragraph from a letter which I received from Admiral Taylor in regard to Great Britain's program. This letter was written last December. He says:

> My latest information is to the effect that practically all new construction, airplanes, seaplanes, and airships is at a standstill in England on account of the economic situation.

Now, that is your program for Great Britain.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. In a moment. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that we need to appropriate more than we have in this bill for aviation to keep it effective and efficient, although I am free to admit that we can neither expand or carry forward our program to the degree we would all like to see. One of the greatest needs of aviation is for carriers to convey our aircraft and make the air service mobile and a factor with the fleet. We have not provided for these ships. Neither have we allowed for the conversion into fleet tenders of any merchant ships. While we all realize the importance of these vessels, we did not recommend them, owing to the expense. In the near future we must provide for a lighter-than-air station on the Atlantic somewhere near Miami and another at San Diego. With our fleet now on the Pacific, air facilities must be provided on that coast, as well as in Hawaii; but our committee left all this to more favorable times. I now yield to my friend from Mississippi.

Mr. VENABLE. The gentleman stated that in England this year they had appropriated $60,000,000 for aviation, $8,000,000 of which was for civilian aviation, leaving $52,000,000 for the army and the navy. That would be about $25,000,000 apiece if you divided it half and half.

Mr. HICKS. They are the estimates. Now, if they cut the estimates as much in Great Britain as we cut them here, you will have that cut down to about $15,000,000 apiece for each branch of the service.

Mr. VENABLE. But the gentleman says "if."

Mr. HICKS. The same "if" applies there as it did here, and they are reasonable people in Great Britain and feel the necessity of economy.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will say to the gentleman from New York that this item of $15,876,000 does not include the pay of either men or officers.

Mr. HICKS. No. I omitted to reply to my friend's question. I wish to say in regard to that query of the gentleman from Michigan that when we consider aviation we consider aviation only as it applies to the maintenance of stations and the procurement of aircraft generally, and there are various items appropriated in other parts of the bill under other headings of which aviation has the benefit, like the pay of officers and the pay of men, which comes out of "Pay of the Navy," and ordnance and some quartermaster stores, which materially increases the amount available for aircraft over what it would be if these items had to be met out of this item.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. We were asked, as I recollect, for 6,000 men and 500 officers. Six thousand men would cost the Government about $6,000,000 a year and 500 officers would cost at least $1,500,000. That would be $7,500,000 to be added to this $15,876,000, making $23,376,000 to the other incidental items carried in this bill, so that this bill carries practically $25,000,000 for aviation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman stated that Great Britain had appropriated $60,000,000 for aviation, counting the pound at $4; but in England the pound is $4.86, so that counting it at the English pound it would be $1,290,000 more than the $60,000,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, the pound is worth its value in gold, and on a gold basis to-day the pound is worth $3.71.

Mr. PADGETT. In exchange over here, but in their own dealings and in their own currency it passes at $4.86, so that that would add $1,290,000 to the $60,000,000.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. May I ask where they procure the spruce for the construction of those airplanes on the other side?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Does the matter of exchange enter into the purchase of that spruce?

Mr. PADGETT. I really do not know where they get it. They may get it from Canada, where their money would pass current.

But I want to call attention also to the fact that while the Navy Department wanted 6,000 men for aviation, as indicated by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY], and 500 officers, we have not provided those 500 officers additional in this bill.

Mr. BUTLER. They have them now.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. They did not ask for 500 in addition to the number we have provided in the bill.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, they did.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. They will not get them.

Mr. PADGETT. They wanted them out of the temporary force. It all came down to the other question, and it occurs to me that the argument of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE] is well grounded and well founded. I think it would be a very wise provision to deal more liberally with aviation. I have taken that personal view heretofore in former Congresses and also in the discussion of the make-up of this present bill, and I think it would be very well for us to appropriate the same amount that the last Congress appropriated of $25,000,000, which was a reduction of $10,000,000 below the amount that was put on by the Senate amendment, the Senate having receded from $10,000,000; so that, for whatever it may be worth, I indorse the amendment for the $25,000,000 for aviation, believing it will be well invested and be of great benefit to our country.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am reminded that we have spent $214,000,000 on naval aviation in the last two years, and we certainly ought to have gotten something out of that expenditure. And, by the way, I am reminded that my good friend in economy, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], is not here to talk and vote against this altogether unjustified proposed increase.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I had an amendment that I wanted to offer on page 6, line 22, following the aeroplane matter, and I wanted to ask consent to return to that paragraph for the purpose of offering the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us hear it read, if the gentleman please.

Mr. PADGETT. I will send the amendment to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to return to page 6, line 22, for the purpose of offering an amendment, which the Clerk will report for information.

Mr. BUTLER. I reserve the right to object to it after I hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. PADGETT: Page 6, line 22, after the word "repairs," insert "Provided further, That the sum of $75,000 is hereby appropriated to complete the construction of an additional room to the National Museum Building, Washington, D. C., for proper housing and exhibition of the seaplane NC-4."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to return to that portion of the bill for the purpose of offering the amendment which has been read. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. I object.

Mr. PADGETT. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter that I received from Secretary Roosevelt, Acting Secretary of the Navy, regarding this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the letter referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

MARCH 18, 1920.

MY DEAR MR. PADGETT: I want to give you further information regarding the present status of the seaplane NC-4, which subject has been brought to your attention as a regent of the Smithsonian Institution.

The interest evidenced in the NC-4 by people from all over the country is to some extent shown by the following. When the NC-4 was assembled in Central Park upon its return from abroad enormous numbers of people were crowded around it during the daylight hours for a period of two weeks of exhibition. From the time the NC-4 was removed from Central Park to the actual start on the recruiting cruise around the Atlantic, Gulf Coast, Mississippi Valley, and during that cruise an enormous correspondence was received from all parts of the United States requesting a visit be made by this famous seaplane. After this cruise was proposed, practically every town on or near the route made an appeal for a visit. Requests for exhibition continue to arrive from many parts of the country.

Intense interest was shown wherever the NC-4 was exhibited. In the smaller places every able-bodied person was there to see it arrive and depart. Some public officials claimed that more interest and excitement had been occasioned than ever before in the history of the town.

A great many newspaper clippings of articles and editorials have been received regarding the final disposition of the NC-4. All of them, without exception, assumed that this prided national possession would be permanently placed upon exhibition. Some even declared that it was improper to send it on this long cruise owing to the risk of loss or damage.

Many articles compared the NC-4 in historic value to that of Columbus's ship, and that the country has the NC-4 and should by all means provide now an exhibition for future generations.

This wonderful flying boat has probably made its last flight and has earned the right to good treatment. She has shown the spirit of the United States Navy to the world. Her crew was made up of typical American naval officers and men. They made good.

Owing to lack of storage space the NC-4 is now dismantled at Rockaway air station.

I am convinced that the final exhibit of this world-famous seaplane should be in the National Museum at Washington, D. C. As there is a hundred and twenty-five foot wing spread, there has been found only one solution other than a new building; this is in the west court of the National Museum.

Expenses involved will amount to the sum of about $75,000. A concrete flooring and glass roofing, together with certain fittings, will be required.

The proper officials have been communicated with and approve of this construction of a roofing over the west court.

I inclose a photostat of the National Museum.

Respectfully, yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

The Hon. LEMUEL P. PADGETT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The Clerk read as follows:

Care of lepers, etc., island of Guam: Naval station, island of Guam: Maintenance and care of lepers, special patients, and for other purposes, including cost of transfer of lepers from Guam to the island of Culion, in the Philippines, and their maintenance, $20,000.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of asking my friend from Pennsylvania, chairman of the committee, concerning the situation of the lepers at Guam. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if there is anything in the hearings to show the status of those lepers, how many there are, and what proportion of this $20,000 will be used for the lepers?

Mr. BUTLER. I believe this to be the usual appropriation. It is, perhaps, twice as large as it was five years ago.

Mr. JUUL. How many lepers are there?

Mr. BUTLER. I used to know. I confess that I have forgotten, and I am glad I have.

Mr. JUUL. I hope there are not any.

Mr. BUTLER. There are a few. We appropriate for their care every dollar that the department asks. They are supposed to be well and contented and as cheerful as such unfortunate human beings can be. Whatever the department has asked, I think, we have appropriated without a question. We have asked the department what it wanted. It has told us, and we made the appropriation.

Mr. JUUL. I want to call attention to the fact that all of the $20,000 is not to be used for the lepers, but is for special purposes, or other purposes. There might not be anything for the lepers.

Mr. BUTLER. This is for the maintenance and care of lepers, special patients—and they are called special patients—and for other purposes, including the cost of transfer of lepers from Guam to the Island of Culion, in the Philippines. It is not a large sum, but we are assured that it is all that is necessary. If they had asked for more money, the committee would gladly have reported it.

Mr. JUUL. I thank the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Recreation for enlisted men: For the recreation, amusement, comfort, contentment, and health of the Navy, and for such other purposes of like character as the Secretary of the Navy may deem advisable, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, under such regulations as he may prescribe: Provided, That not more than one person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum, $800,000.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not, in his opinion, the fleet will be divided between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts?

Mr. BUTLER. I shall be greatly disappointed if it is not.

Mr. ELSTON. In that event does the gentleman think that adequate preparation has been made for the care of the fleet on the Pacific coast?

Mr. BUTLER. I believe it has for the time being. The very subject to which the gentleman refers gave the Committee on Naval Affairs a good deal of concern. Did the gentleman from California direct my attention to the paragraph that has just been read or to the subject generally?

Mr. ELSTON. No; not to this paragraph particularly, but to the matter generally?

Mr. BUTLER. I thought that would come up later.

Mr. ELSTON. I wanted to ask the general question now. Would the gentleman give a brief comparative statement of the facilities on the Atlantic coast and on the Pacific coast?

Mr. BUTLER. The facilities for the care, preparation, and maintenance on the Atlantic coast for the fleet are ample in my judgment, and more than ample. The defense of this Nation hereafter will in part be directed to the Pacific coast. We have navy yards, stations, stopping places, all kept in order, and hundreds of millions of dollars spent on them within the last 20 or 30 years on the Atlantic coast. Now that the fleet has been divided and one-half gone to the Pacific there will be more to go to the Pacific in the next few years, and it will be the duty of Congress to make an examination and determine the policy of caring for the fleet there through stations to be established and make appropriations therefor. In short, the care that has been and will be given to the Atlantic must be given to the Pacific.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman say whether the action of the committee in refusing to make the appropriation recommended by the Secretary of the Navy, or in carrying out at this time the recommendations of the Helm Commission and the McKean Commission, can be construed as a repudiation of those recommendations?

Mr. BUTLER. No; I am speaking only for myself. I do not know that I will be living or a Member of the next Congress, but somebody will be left here who will consider the advisability of establishing at least one more point in California for additional facilities for the care of the great fleet. We have a good many docks now on that coast. We have also Honolulu, where the Government has spent eight to ten million dollars, and it may be more.

Mr. PADGETT. Seventeen to eighteen million dollars.

Mr. BUTLER. I am obliged to the gentleman—his recollection is much better than mine. It has been stated to us by military men that that is the key of the Pacific, and inasmuch as we have made enormous expenditures there we intend to stay there until somebody stronger comes along and puts us out. We are there on the Pacific, and we mean to dig in—to use a fighting term—and not go to some other point where we are not sure.

Mr. ELSTON. What I wanted to elicit was this——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELSTON. I want to know whether or not the committee still feels that its mind is open to consider the recommendations of experts on this matter?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. And that the action of the committee at the present time, in not making the appropriations recommended, should not be taken as adverse to these recommendations?

Mr. BUTLER. No.

Mr. ELSTON. But merely as a deferment of them.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to say to my friend that I think we listened to the experts of the Treasury more than we did to the military experts. The Treasury will be stronger next year. I can not say any more than I have to my friend. It is a problem for the future.

Mr. ELSTON. Has the gentleman in his mind an aggregate of the appropriations made for the care of the fleet in the way of permanent improvements on the Atlantic coast within the last five years, as compared with expenditures on the Pacific?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes. Let me tell the gentleman something to take home with him. This country has spent upon the land for the Navy within the last two years and a half $334,000,000.

Mr. ELSTON. In what locality?

Mr. BUTLER. All over; wherever there was any place they could spend the money. I am not making any criticism, for we were in war, but a lot of these places must be abandoned, and if I have a vote on it I shall vote in favor of abandonment. It is the purpose of the department to abandon them, and no sort of influence must be brought here, in my judgment, to keep them. We ought to go where the Nation can be best served, and I am in favor, when we go out on the Pacific coast, of finding the best water in the most available place.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a few questions.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall try to answer them.

Mr. MILLER. I see the bill carries the acceptance of the Navy Department of 127 acres of land at San Diego.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. For naval-station purposes?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Is it the disposition of the committee to establish at San Diego a naval station on the Pacific?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; Congress has ordered it to be done. That was the order of Congress made in the last session, was it not?

Mr. KETTNER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Can the gentleman give an idea of where at San Diego this naval station is to be established?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; I wish I could give it directly to the gentleman——

Mr. HICKS. It is at the head of the bay, on the mainland.

Mr. BUTLER. It is right on the bay I know; I have it in mind——

Mr. HICKS. It is at the southern end of the bay on the mainland.

Mr. MILLER. I am familiar with that country, and if the gentleman will tell me where it is I will be able to locate it.

Mr. BUTLER. The southern end of the bay. I have it in my mind; I was there for a short time two or three years ago. I wish I had the map here to point it out.

Mr. MILLER. I want to ask the gentleman if this naval station is to be located on the 127 acres of land that the city of San Diego is giving?

Mr. BUTLER. I believe so; yes.

Mr. PADGETT. There are two parcels of land embraced in the description. One of them is at the foot of Broadway in the deep water.

Mr. MILLER. Is that where the navy yard is supposed to be?

Mr. PADGETT. No; that is where they have provided for stores. Another parcel is where the Shipping Board had their shipbuilding plant.

Mr. MILLER. I know where that is.

Mr. PADGETT. It is that shipbuilding plant that is being turned over by the Shipping Board to the Navy, and the city of San Diego is making a gift of the land, and the two together are estimated to be worth something like $2,000,000. I refer now to the land the city of San Diego is giving to the Government for that purpose.

Mr. MILLER. Does the gentleman tell me that this navy-yard site that Congress is obligated to accept and build——

Mr. BUTLER. This is a naval station.

Mr. MILLER. The bill says for a naval station.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have more time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Does the gentleman say that the naval station is not to be established at San Diego, or is it?

Mr. BUTLER. I want to tell the gentleman just what my understanding of it is. The first thing to be established there, which is already being established, is a station for the marines. Second, there is a training station for the boys of the Navy, and third, there will be a plant where we will repair our small boats. Beyond that I do not anticipate any further construction. There is a marine railway, which, if the appropriation remains in the bill, is to be moved from its present location to this ground which we are to receive, if the House will permit us to receive it.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. All of these items will have to be gone over again, if we pursue them now. Why not wait until we reach them in the bill?

Mr. MILLER. I am not asking about the items. I have not referred to them. I refer to the 127 acres of land, which are not in the bill at all, except to confirm the gift, and I want to know whether it is on that tract of land that this naval station is to be established.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; it is.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. It is to be built where the present Shipping Board facilities are?

Mr. MILLER. Are the present Shipping Board facilities on this 127 acres of land?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. They must be.

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Chairman, the 127 acres the gentleman refers to is where the Shipping Board is at present building concrete ships, and the Shipping Board has spent $1,150,000 on this ground. They only had a lease. The 1917 bill carried an item for a marine railway at San Diego. The Navy proposes to take this marine railway and move it from the present coaling-station site down to the site offered by the people of San Diego, on which the Shipping Board is at present building these ships.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I have not gotten the information yet. I want to know, and probably the gentleman from California can tell me, or if any member of the Committee on Naval Affairs can tell me, if this naval station to be established under this bill at San Diego is to be established on this 127 acres of land which is being given by the city of San Diego?

Mr. KETTNER. I was not aware they were to have a navy yard at San Diego, but simply a marine railway.

Mr. MILLER. The bill says for the purpose of being used as a naval station.

Mr. BUTLER. A naval repair station.

Mr. MILLER. We all know what a naval station is.

Mr. PADGETT. If the gentleman will permit me. The Secretary of the Navy has designated San Diego as a naval station. We already have other naval activities there. For instance, several years ago we acquired by gift from the city of San Diego a Marine Corps base on which we are building—232 acres of dry land and 500 acres of tide land, making 732 acres in that tract.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. PADGETT. I will ask for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, we have, in addition to the Marine Corps base activities on the far side of the bay from San Diego, a coaling station and marine railway and another activity next to the marine railway of the Public Health Service, which is not under the Navy. Now, on the other side of the bay, on the city side, they propose to give at the foot of Broadway the lot described in the present bill, which is the most valuable water front on the whole bay. They propose to put upon that a storehouse and officers' quarters as a part of the storehouse for the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, and then upon this tract of land to which the gentleman referred, 127 acres, I do not know personally the number of acres, but the land that the Shipping Board has a lease upon and upon which it has expended more than a million dollars. The Shipping Board has signified its willingness, and has, I believe, turned over its lease to the Navy Department.

Mr. MILLER. I understand that.

Mr. PADGETT. And then the city of San Diego, which owns the fee, proposes to deed the property in fee to the Government for the use of the Navy, and all of these activities are designated as a naval station, and the Secretary of the Navy stated that he proposed establishing there a station equipped and fitted to do small repairing. It is about 500 miles south of San Francisco.

Mr. MILLER. I will say to the gentleman that I am familiar with all of this land, and have been over it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MILLER. I have not had my question answered yet, and I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER. The phraseology of the bill says that the 127 acres is to be the site of the naval station. Now, I want to know, is it to be used as a naval station? We all know what that is, and I want to know if that is to be on this land?

Mr. PADGETT. That is to be part, and part is on the other land, as I explained to the gentleman. The naval station proposition language may be a little inadequate.

Mr. MILLER. I should think so.

Mr. PADGETT. It should have been for "naval station uses."

Mr. MILLER. It is misleading. If you wish to put a naval station on the 127 acres of land the city of San Diego is offering, you can not put it there; it is not located in the right place nor is it large enough, and everybody knows it who has examined it——

Mr. PADGETT. That tract is included with the other I mentioned awhile ago, and——

Mr. MILLER. But they are several miles distant.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; circling around the water.

Mr. MILLER. That is several miles distance from this.

Mr. PADGETT. Circling around the water, it is. But they constitute in the aggregate a naval station.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. There has been considerable discussion of the bill in general but none on the particular paragraph before the committee. I understood the gentleman to say that there is a considerably reduced personnel in the Navy provided for in this bill from that which is provided for in the Navy during the current year. Is that correct?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. What is the explanation for the doubling up of this particular item, which is $400,000 in the current law with a larger personnel and is $800,000 in the present bill with a less personnel in the Navy?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, last year we had in the service from 130,000 to 150,000 men and we used for their recreation something like $1,300,000, all of it, with the exception of the $400,000 appropriated by Congress, I will say to my friend, coming from private subscription. These private contributions have now been withdrawn and therefore the committee thought it advisable to double the amount; so for this year we will have about $800,000 to be employed in the amusement of these men in a certain way. The officers who have charge of the recreation service thought that was not nearly enough and they wanted much more. They would like to have had the amount of money they had last year, that they received both from the Government and from private subscription. But the amount was fixed at $800,000, which will probably enable them to amuse and keep contented and cheerful and clean and healthy these young men of the service, who may perhaps reach 125,000 or 130,000 men in numbers this year.

Mr. TILSON. In what general way is this money expended when it is expended by the Government itself? We all know the methods employed by private organizations and individuals. How does the Government expend it?

Mr. BUTLER. In entertainment of all kinds for the young men.

Mr. TILSON. In moving pictures?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes. And I am very glad to say to my friend that this is one part of the service I thoroughly enjoy and that I have enlisted in—that is, the moving-picture end of it. It keeps them in at night; it keeps them looking at the pictures instead of out from places of confinement. From the care that is being given these lads there is practically no punishment now in the service. These people look to their pleasures, look after the boys, keep them well dressed, well contented, and well fed, and altogether add much to the contentment of the men in the Navy. I will say to my friend that I thought we could get along with some less money, but the hearings were very complete, and the gentlemen on the committee appreciated more than I did—and I am glad they did—the advisability of increasing this sum of money to the amount that we have reported here. It is well spent, and is better than medicine for the men.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I will.

Mr. PADGETT. The appropriation by the House last year was $400,000, but they got from these welfare organizations something like a million and a couple of hundred thousand or more, in addition, so that they had available more than a million and a half for this purpose last year.

Mr. TILSON. What happened before the war and before these large sums were ever expended for entertainment? What happened in our old Navy? The gentleman is an authority on that?

Mr. PADGETT. I can tell you about it. In the cities they put in their time running around to places that were not desirable—running about wild and without proper entertainment. Now, the purpose of this is to provide for football and for baseball and for moving pictures on shore and moving pictures on the ships. And I will say that when the committee went abroad in 1918 on the battleship Arkansas—and we were about 14 days on that ship—every night they had magnificent moving pictures there for the men, and there were something like 1,400 or 1,500 men on that ship.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I want to say this to my friend from Connecticut, that there is one feature of it that I think he will be interested in knowing about, and what is being done with this fund in part. Whenever a ship approaches a port, say the port of Hongkong, they have a series of colored photograph films which illustrate all the historical points in that city, and that reel is run off for several nights before they enter the port. A little booklet is then furnished as to the places to be seen to every man, so that when a man steps over the gangplank he will know the main places of interest to visit in Hongkong. That is done at every port. And I wish to say that in addition there are swimming pools and libraries, which have not been mentioned.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman know whether it is the intention of the military side of the Government to use the same form of entertainment and call on the Treasury for the same amount for entertainment for the Army?

Mr. HICKS. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, but I do not believe there is a dollar in this bill that is better expended than the money provided for in this item. We went into the item thoroughly, and we feel that the health conditions of the men, the effect of houses of ill repute, would be minimized by giving to the men clean, healthy recreation for both the mind and the body, and this is provided for under the provisions of this fund.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. I will yield.

Mr. PARRISH. I would like to ask the gentleman—and he is a member of the committee—what this item of $800,000 for recreation of enlisted men includes?

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman from Tennessee fully explained it. It means everything that is necessary to develop these boys physically. It means baseball games; all their baseball and football equipment, and all the equipment of their gymnasiums, the swimming pools, and all sorts of amusements, lectures, moving pictures, and everything that will attract them and make them strong and healthy, so that they will not need doctors or policemen.

Mr. PARRISH. I see that very clearly, but I notice in the next paragraph you have an item for the purchase of gymnastic apparatus, and again on page 11 I notice you have an item on that page, in the second line, for gymnastic implements. And I notice again, on line 21, you have another item for gymnastic implements, and I notice again, on page 12, you have an item, in line 16, for gymnastic implements. And I note on page 15 you have an item for "music in chapel and entertainments for beneficiaries." It seems to me all those items could properly come under this paragraph providing for entertainment.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to my friend that they have been carried year in and year out that way, and I wish I could give my friend a really sensible answer to his question. Some of them are at the training school, but the item for "purchase of gymnastic apparatus" comes under a contingency of $20,000. Of course, they would not get very much there. There may be some point where it would be necessary to use a little of that money. But the principal item for this service is what I have reference to, and I know my friend will appreciate it, because he has been in a gymnasium much of his time—the necessity of having these boys made good and strong not only in their bodies but in their conduct.

Mr. BRIGGS. I would like to ask the chairman, from the experience in the past, since they have had this recreation work in effect, has it proven its worth in increased efficiency of the men?

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, yes. The health conditions have improved. We ask the doctors; we ask the Bureau of Navigation. It is all as plain as can be. When these men are not at work, they are amused, and they get some touch of home life. They do not run wild.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Outfits on first enlistment: During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, the clothing and small stores fund shall be charged with the value of all issues of clothing and small stores made to enlisted men and apprentice seamen required as outfits on first enlistment, not to exceed $100 each, and for civilian clothing not to exceed $15 per man to men given discharges for bad conduct, undesirability, or inaptitude, and the uniform gratuity paid to officers of the Naval Reserve Force.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. JUUL: Page 9, beginning with line 10, strike out the paragraph, down to and including line 18.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not think the Committee on Naval Affairs would want this paragraph to stand as it is. I have moved to strike out the paragraph in order to get the opportunity to call the attention of the committee to what I consider is a great error in the item. When you take a young man into the Navy you provide him with $100 worth of clothing. In line 15 you provide that if for any reason you can not use him any more you kick him out and allow him $15 for civilian clothing to go home in.

I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to a case that came to my notice during the war. A young man enlisted, and one day the mother of that boy took the boy home in a dying condition. They took the overcoat off the back of that boy. It is absolutely impossible at the present price of clothing for you to take $100 worth of clothing off a boy and then set out to equip him with $15 worth of civilian clothing in which to go home when for any reason he is found to be unfit or ill or not suited for the service.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, this is the law.

Mr. JUUL. I know it is the law, and I am telling you that the law has worked cruelties, and I hope when I tell you that that you will not stand for it.

Mr. BUTLER. I am glad the gentleman has made that statement, because——

Mr. JUUL. You would have to send that boy home in fig leaves or banana leaves if you had to equip him to go home to his parents with only $15. You can not do it, and it has not been done. There are many of these boys who can not call upon their parents and relatives for the difference necessary to properly clothe and equip them so that they can go home.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUUL. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. Does the gentleman realize that largely this money is to be used for those men who are dishonorably discharged from the service?

Mr. JUUL. I have read the paragraph, and this is what it says:

And for civilian clothing, not to exceed $15 per man, to men given discharges for bad conduct, undesirability, or inaptitude.

It does not matter what he is discharged for. There is $15 available to purchase and equip him to go home as a civilian. I take it for granted that you gentlemen—and I know most of you personally—are to be looked upon as warm-hearted and kind-hearted gentlemen.

Mr. BUTLER. That is the reason why we give them the $15 worth.

Mr. JUUL. But you can not take his uniform from him and send him home naked in the winter if you discharge him from a northern port, perhaps a thousand miles or two thousand miles away from home. You can not equip him with that money. I say give him a suit of clothes and a hat and a pair of shoes and socks and an overcoat and send him home. Strike out the amount. You take $100 from the boy when you turn him out, and you give him $85 less than what you take from him.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DOWELL). The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. JUUL. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARRISH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question, and if he can not answer it I would like the chairman of the committee or some other member of the committee to answer it.

Mr. JUUL. I will attempt to answer it.

Mr. PARRISH. Is it not a fact that boys who have enlisted and who are under age—enlisted without the consent of their parents—come under this provision and get only $15?

Mr. JUUL. Yes; and they are not properly equipped.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUUL. Yes; I will yield to my distinguished friend.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman is laboring under a mistake. When the boy goes in he gets $100 worth of clothes as a credit. When he gets that, the clothing is his. It is his individual property, and it is not taken away from him.

Mr. JUUL. I hope the gentleman will not consume my entire five minutes. In the position the gentleman is in he can get all the time he wants.

Mr. PADGETT. The clothing is his private property, and he takes it with him.

Mr. JUUL. Yes?

Mr. PADGETT. If he is discharged for bad conduct and is not given an honorable discharge, they give him, in addition to the $100 worth of military clothing that he has got, $15 worth of civilian clothing.

Mr. JUUL. I want to tell the gentleman of a feature of the case that I referred to—a proper and authentic case. In that case they took the military overcoat off a consumptive boy, and the mother took a piece of fur and wrapped it around him. I take it that if that boy is worth $100 worth of clothing when he is taken in, he should have a decent amount when he goes out.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment, in which I move to strike out the paragraph, and change it to this effect: Strike out the words, in line 15, "not to exceed $15 per man."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MANN of Illinois). The gentleman asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment offered by Mr. JUUL: Page 9, line 15, strike out the words "not to exceed $15 per man."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment, mainly for the purpose of getting some information. If you strike out that provision, would not the gentleman leave it in an attitude where it is likely that the boy will not be entitled even to the $15?

Mr. BUTLER. No; he will not get that.

Mr. JUUL. "Not to exceed $100 each, and for civilian clothing." Now you gentlemen put in the amount.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to ask the gentleman or some member of the committee, merely for information, when a young man enlists in the Navy he goes there with civilian clothes on. Do they take away those civilian clothes and prevent him from keeping them so that he will have them available when he is discharged from the service?

Mr. JUUL. He may be discharged miles away from where enlisted.

Mr. HICKS. That clothing is shipped back to his home.

Mr. JUUL. And he may be 16 years of age when he enlists and 22 years of age when they let him go.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. SEARS. I will state that I have many cases in my State where the Government kept the clothes; that is, I presume they undertook to send them home or put them somewhere, but no officer has ever been able to locate the clothes. So, as a matter of fact, they took the boy's clothes.

Mr. BLANTON. After being fumigated, the clothes are turned back to him, and the young man himself sends them to his home people.

Mr. SEARS. The gentleman's constituents were more fortunate than mine. I will say that the clothes have never reached these boys or their people.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what my constituents do with theirs.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to ask a question. The case cited by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL], according to the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], was an exceptional case, and evidently under the regulations, as I understand the gentleman's statement, they had no right to take the uniform away from him.

Mr. PADGETT. When he gets his $100 that clothing is his own.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. This entire paragraph is inserted in the bill in the place of an estimate for $6,000,000 for clothing for this purpose. It developed in the hearings that during the war the Navy had accumulated clothing, both for enlisted men in the Navy and for officers, to the amount of about $80,000,000. Having so much clothing on hand, it was thought entirely unnecessary to appropriate $6,000,000 to buy any more. So we simply authorized the Navy Department to supply this clothing and be credited for that amount by the Treasury. That is all that is attempted to be done by this paragraph. It is a bookkeeping matter merely.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In other words, it is really a bookkeeping transaction?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Absolutely a bookkeeping transaction. Now, as to the other proposition proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL], I do not think it would be advisable to remove the limit entirely and allow these boys who have been discharged an unlimited supply of clothing. It seems to me that the law as it stands now is ample to take care of every case. I believe the paragraph should stand as drawn by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval Reserve Force: For expenses of organizing, administering, and recruiting the Naval Reserve Force, for the maintenance and rental of armories, including the pay of necessary janitors, and for wharfage, $50,000.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that I do not believe this is quite the right place for that amendment.

Mr. DOWELL. It seems to me it ought to go in here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOWELL: Page 13, line 16, after the figures "$50,000," insert: "Provided, That no part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used for the return or recall of any member of the Naval Reserve Force to active duty for training or any other purpose."

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman desires to make the point of order, I desire to have it made now.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No; I do not desire to make it now.

Mr. PADGETT. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up too much time on this amendment, but it is important. Last year the committee of its own motion inserted the following clause in the bill:

That during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, no member of the Naval Reserve Force shall be recalled to active duty for training or any other purpose except as hereinbefore provided.

And the "hereinbefore provided" was that the President in an emergency might make a call, and so forth. Now, it seems to me that there is no more reason why next year we should call the reserves than there was last year. The Navy Department has already provided for the recall of this reserve, and this $50,000 provided in this paragraph is only a part of it. Over on page 27 of the bill there is an item of some $12,000,000, which carries the pay of this reserve force, and there are a good many items in this bill providing for the pay of this reserve force, clearly demonstrating that the Navy Department intend to recall the reserve force of the Navy to active duty as soon as this bill is passed.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the Navy officials of some of these naval stations have sent out a summons to the Naval Reserves already to return?

Mr. DOWELL. As I stated a while ago, anticipating the passage of this act, the Navy Department has already sent notices to these boys requiring their attendance on the 1st of July, the day following the expiration of the appropriation in the last bill under which it is now operating. Now, it seems to me that these boys, who offered their services during the war, ought to be relieved at this time from being called, now that the war is over, and they should not be called into active service at a time when they are unable to come. Not only that, but if it is for the sole purpose of calling them for a week or two and bringing them across the continent, it will be at an enormous expense to the Government. Last year the committee did not see fit to go to this extraordinary expense, and it occurs to me that there is no more reason why we should bring these boys to the service this year than there was last year. I am hoping that the committee in their wisdom may see fit to accept this amendment, which I believe ought to be adopted.

Now, one other thing, I want to suggest that these boys now in the reserve force are in this position: They enlisted for the war. Under the terms of this bill the Navy Department can now draft them into the service because they are subject to call, being in the reserve. These boys were compelled to enlist for four years, although most of them only desired to enlist during the war. In view of the fact that they enlisted for four years, because it was the only term of service that they could be accepted for, they are now subject to call and to be brought into the service whether they are able to come or not.

Mr. JUUL. May I ask the gentleman how long might they be called to serve for?

Mr. DOWELL. I do not know. I think that under the law they could be called for any term as long as they are in the reserve. I think it is up to the department to determine the term of service.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] called my attention to the facts that he has presented to the House. I at once telegraphed to Admiral Bassett, of the Great Lakes station, surmising that if there were any orders of that kind they would come from the Great Lakes station, and the telegram which the gentleman read was in answer to my telegram. I am going to read one or two extracts from it to bring to the House the information:

No orders sent calling reserves to training in July. Circular letter sent stating that training would be required after July 1.

The circular letter that the gentleman from Iowa is complaining about reads as follows. It is dated February 1, 1920.

Members of the reserve force on inactive duty, until the expiration of their enrollment, will be required, beginning July 1, 1920, to perform at least two weeks' active duty for training on a naval vessel each year.

I went to see Admiral Washington about this matter, and he assured me that no orders had been sent out from the Bureau of Navigation calling these men into service for the two weeks' training provided for. More than that, he said that if any commandant of any district had sent out orders calling the reserves back for training this summer he would countermand those orders. He assured me that those orders have been countermanded.

Mr. DOWELL. If you adopt the amendment that I have suggested every order will be countermanded without reference to his statement.

Mr. HICKS. Here is an amendment which the admiral is perfectly willing shall be put in; it is practically the law now, but it puts it down in black and white:

After the figures insert: "Provided, That no part of this money shall be used for the training of any member of the naval reserve force except with his own consent."

That would mean that no man who may be under some misapprehension in regard to his duty as a member of the Naval Reserve Force would be compelled to take the training unless he himself was willing to so take it. I believe we must have something for these men to do, otherwise there would be no Naval Reserve Force.

Let me say that in the last war the Naval Reserve Force was the backbone of the Navy itself.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. I will.

Mr. SEARS. Suppose a member of the Naval Reserve Force should refuse to go, would that affect his standing?

Mr. HICKS. Not a particle.

Mr. SEARS. Would he still get an honorable discharge and still hold his status in the Navy?

Mr. HICKS. Yes. Let me say that the training of these boys is cumulative. They are not compelled to take so much training a year; if they take three months' training in the time of their enrollment, that qualifies them. They could take the entire amount of training in the last year and still come under the requirements.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to offer as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa the following, which I send to the desk:

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. HICKS for the amendment offered by Mr. DOWELL: Page 13, line 16, after the figures "$50,000," insert: "Provided, That no part of this money shall be used for the training of any member of the Naval Reserve Force except with his own consent."

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, that would not cover the question, because the amount in this paragraph is the small amount of $50,000, while the money used for training the boys is in another paragraph which carries $12,000,000.

Mr. HICKS. We are a little bit confused, because the gentleman from Iowa did not offer his amendment in the right place.

Mr. DOWELL. I am content with the place I have just offered it, and it will fill the bill if you adopt it.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. If that language was changed so that it read "no part of the money appropriated in this act," it would cover the whole question. I offer the following amendment to the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KELLEY of Michigan to the substitute offered by Mr. HICKS: After the word "money" insert the words "appropriated in this act."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 16, after the figures "$50,000," insert: "Provided, That no part of the money appropriated in this act shall be used for the training of any member of the Naval Reserve Force except with his own consent."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa may be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOWELL: Page 13, line 16, after the figures "$50,000," insert: "Provided, That no part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used for the return or recall of any member of the Naval Reserve force to active duty, for training, or any other purpose."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] for the purpose of making a suggestion to him. The gentleman will note that the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] pertains to training. The amendment which is offered by my colleague, Mr. DOWELL, pertains to the return and recall for training purposes.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In a moment. It seems to me that the object of the gentleman's amendment would be accomplished and would better fit in with the bill if it was offered as an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] by simply adding to the amendment offered by him the words "without his consent." I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL], if it were agreed to, would prohibit the Navy Department from calling these men back into the service if we were to get into open war. It says "for any other purpose." They can be called in case of emergency or in case of war, but under his amendment they could not be called back if we were actually attacked anywhere.

Mr. DOWELL. It says "this appropriation." If there was trouble anywhere and they desired it, another appropriation would bring them into the service.

Mr. PADGETT. But we would have to have additional legislation in order to get the men back in case of emergency.

Mr. DOWELL. And you would have to have further appropriation.

Mr. PADGETT. No; we would not.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I take it that what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] wants to accomplish is to fix it so that these boys will not be recalled this year.

Mr. DOWELL. That is the idea.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is what this amendment does.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And also that the Naval Reserve now in the service shall be trained. I am not entirely clear but what the gentleman's amendment might permit some man in the service to say, "I do not want to go on any further."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman be satisfied if it is written finally into this bill that no part of this money appropriated in this bill shall be used to either recall or train a man without his consent?

Mr. DOWELL. "Without his consent" is not added to my amendment, but if there is any question about it I am willing to let that be added.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. The amendment the gentleman refers to is the amendment that I offered at the suggestion of Admiral Washington, the head of the Bureau of Navigation, so I imagine that he must have foreseen the difficulty the gentleman is now presenting.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Just let me add one word further. I have often found that amendments coming from the department do not express what the department intends or wants, so that I am not inclined to accept that as an absolute guide. I think that the criticism offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] to the amendment offered by my colleague is valid. I am inclined to think those words "for any other purpose" ought to be stricken out in the substitute and the words "without his consent" added. But I confess that I have not made enough investigation into the subject to commit myself any more than to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Michigan that I think possibly that the amendment that he offers might get the Navy into trouble in some other way, so I presume that he has considered all of that.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, may I submit a request for unanimous consent? I ask unanimous consent that there be added to my amendment the words "without his consent."

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. How about the language in the gentleman's amendment, "for any other purpose"?

Mr. DOWELL. I doubt that, because in the gentleman's amendment of last year they were not recalled.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No; but the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], I think, made a very valid objection, that there might be some need for their recall.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to amend his amendment by adding to his amendment the language, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the Dowell amendment the words "without his consent," so that as amended it will read:

"Provided, That no part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used for the return or recall of any member of the Naval Reserve Force to active duty for training or any other purpose without his consent."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] to the amendment which he has previously offered.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the substitute as amended by the gentleman from New York [Mr.

HICKS] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] as amended.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to make the suggestion that the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS], as I view it, is not in correct form. I believe that the amendment that I have with the words "for any other purpose" stricken out is in much better form than the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

I think that it would be a better amendment and would be better legislation if it were adopted in that form.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have my amendment read again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will first report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa as amended and then the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 16, after the figures "$50,000," insert "Provided, That no part of any of the appropriation contained in this act shall be used for the return or recall of any member of the Naval Reserve Force to active duty for training or any other purpose without his consent."

The Clerk read the substitute offered by Mr. HICKS to the substitute offered by Mr. DOWELL:

Page 13, line 16, after the figures "$50,000," insert "Provided, That no part of the money appropriated in this act shall be used for the training of any member of the Naval Reserve Force except with his own consent."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move further to amend the Dowell amendment by striking out the words "or any other purpose."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREEN of Iowa to the amendment offered by Mr. DOWELL: Strike out the words "or any other purpose."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the substitute as amended to the original amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the substitute as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the original amendment as amended by the substitute.

The question was taken and the amendment as amended by the substitute was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordnance and ordnance stores: For procuring, producing, preserving, and handling ordnance material; for the armament of ships, for fuel, material, and labor to be used in the general work of the Ordnance Department; for furniture at naval ammunition depots, torpedo stations, naval ordnance plants, and proving grounds; for maintenance of proving grounds, powder factory, torpedo stations, gun factory, ammunition depots, and naval ordnance plants, and for target practice; for the maintenance, repair, or operation of horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, to be used only for official purposes at naval ammunition depots, naval proving grounds, naval ordnance plants, and naval torpedo stations, and for the pay of chemists, clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, naval ordnance plants, and naval ammunition depots: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for chemists, clerical, drafting, inspection, watchmen, and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, naval ordnance plants, and naval ammunition depots for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, shall not exceed $2,000,000; in all, $17,500,000.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 8, insert after the word "horse-drawn" the words "and motor-propelled."

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Maintenance, Bureau of Yards and Docks: For general maintenance of yards and docks, namely, for books, maps, models, and drawings; purchase and repair of fire engines; fire apparatus and plants; machinery; operation, repair, purchase, maintenance of horses and driving teams, carts, timber wheels, and all vehicles, including motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles to be used only for official purposes, and including motor-propelled vehicles for freight-carrying purposes only for use in all navy yards and naval stations; tools and repair of the same; stationery; furniture for Government houses and offices in navy yards and naval stations; coal and other fuel; candles, oil, and gas; attendance on light and power plants; cleaning and clearing up yards and care of buildings; attendance on fires, lights, fire engines, and fire apparatus and plants; incidental labor at navy yards; water tax, tolls, and ferriage; pay of watchmen in navy yard; awnings and packing boxes; and pay for employees on leave, $6,500,000: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for clerical, inspection, drafting, messenger, and other classified work in the navy yards and naval stations, except similar expenditures in the Bureau of Yards and Docks, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, shall not exceed $1,300,000: Provided further, That no part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used for the purchase of passenger-carrying automobiles: Provided further, That during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, operators of motor vehicles who were carried on the rolls of other bureaus prior to July 1, 1920, shall be continued to be so carried where their employment shall be found necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Clerk will correct the spelling of the word "appropriation" in line 10, page 18. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the proviso, page 18. Will the gentleman explain just what it is intended to do by this proviso? It is a rather unusual one.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; it is. Mr. Chairman, heretofore these motor vehicles have been distributed among the various bureaus. They have been maintained by the respective bureaus using them from appropriations made to those bureaus. Now, we propose to have them concentrated in one bureau and maintained by that bureau, so that we can keep track of them; not that we are criticizing anybody or holding anybody under suspicion, but it is proposed in the future to turn over the maintenance of these vehicles to the Bureau of Yards and Docks. They have all gone there now except the machines of two bureaus—Medicine and Surgery and Ordnance. The proposition of turning over the Ordnance vehicles to the Bureau of Yards and Docks for maintenance we will consider in the next appropriation bill. Now, there is always an operator or chauffeur connected with these machines. By this proviso he is to be paid out of the appropriation made to the bureau employing him. When a machine is brought over for maintenance and care to the Bureau of Yards and Docks there is no provision made for the pay of the chauffeur. He is still being paid by the bureau for which we have made the appropriation, and we do not wish to put the charge upon the Bureau of Yards and Docks to pay the chauffeur, and therefore we add this proviso here so there would be no duplication.

Mr. TILSON. Why could not each bureau bear its own expense? Why should not they pay the expense of the chauffeur if he is actually working for that bureau. In other words, why should not the pay roll and the expenditures show the facts?

Mr. BUTLER. I think they should; that is the purpose of this proviso. I want to say this to my friend, that we did not actually have the time further to adjust this. I believe that eventually the Bureau of Yards and Docks will maintain all of these machines, will buy all of these machines, and pay the chauffeurs provided for; but nevertheless at the present time the chauffeurs are still in the different bureaus, and the amount of pay has not been deducted. Now, I will ask my friend, if agreeable to him, to let it stand, and we will consider it further next year.

Mr. TILSON. On the gentleman's statement, I will give the committee one more chance and withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut withdraws the point of order.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Is there a chauffeur for each one of these cars?

Mr. BUTLER. No; not for each one of these cars. There are many automobiles in the service of the Government. Some of them have enlisted men driving them. Officers of commanding rank have enlisted men to operate their machines, and under the law they are entitled to an enlisted man for that purpose; and therefore, in dealing with the subject, the pay of the chauffeur still remains a matter which concerns the bureau employing him. Answering the gentleman's question further, it has been the purpose of the Congress to eliminate as much as possible the use of automobiles and the employment of chauffeurs.

Mr. BARBOUR. I think that is very commendable.

Mr. BUTLER. There are very few, and really they are getting fewer every year. We have provided a law that the Navy hereafter will buy Fords or some machines that will not cost over $500.

Mr. BARBOUR. I heartily commend the committee in its effort.

Mr. BUTLER. That has been the effort right along.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to accept from the city of San Diego, Calif., free from encumbrances and conditions and without cost to the United States Government, a certain tract of land containing 127 acres, more or less, for use as a site for a naval station, being land now leased to the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation. Also a certain other tract of land known as block 14 in the city of San Diego, Calif., together with the land lying between said blocks and the waters of the harbor, and all riparian rights, for use for naval purposes.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment. In line 6, after the word "station," page 20, insert the words "uses and purposes," so that it will read "for use as a site for a naval training station uses and purposes."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PADGETT: Page 20, line 6, after the word "station," insert "uses and purposes."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval station, Cavite, Philippine Islands: Fuel oil, $25,000.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUTLER: Page 21, line 4, after the word "oil," strike out the comma and insert "storage," so as to make the item read "fuel-oil storage."

Mr. BUTLER. That is as asked for by the department.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF SUPPLIES AND ACCOUNTS.

Pay of the Navy: Pay and allowances prescribed by law, of officers on sea duty and other duty, and officers on waiting orders, $33,655,372; officers on the retired list, $3,157,700; commutation of quarters for officers, including boatswains, gunners, carpenters, sailmakers, machinists, pharmacists, pay clerks, and mates, naval constructor, and assistant naval constructors, $3,895,776, and also members of Nurse Corps (female), $1,000; for hire of quarters for officers serving with troops where there are no public quarters belonging to the Government, and where there are not sufficient quarters possessed by the United States to accommodate them or commutation of quarters not to exceed the amount which an officer would receive were he not serving with troops, and hire of quarters for officers and enlisted men on sea duty at such times as they may be deprived of their quarters on board ship due to repairs or other conditions which may render them uninhabitable, $25,000; pay of enlisted men on the retired list, $1,067,950; extra pay to men reenlisting under honorable discharge, $1,175,000; interest on deposit by men, $30,000; pay of petty officers, seamen, landsmen, and apprentice seamen, including men in the engineers' force and men detailed for duty with the Fish Commission, enlisted men, men in trade schools, and pay of enlisted men of the Hospital Corps, $61,603,059; pay of enlisted men undergoing sentence of court-martial, $431,280, and as many machinists as the President may from time to time deem necessary to appoint; and apprentice seamen under training at training stations and on board training ships, at the pay prescribed by law, $1,357,200; pay of the Nurse Corps, $628,200; rent of quarters for members of the Nurse Corps, $39,000; retainer pay and active-service pay of members of the Naval Reserve force, $12,000,000; payment of $60 discharge gratuity, $1,800,000; reimbursement for losses of property under act of October 6, 1917, $10,000; in all, $120,876,537; and the money herein specifically appropriated for "Pay of the Navy" shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law as "Pay of the Navy," and for that purpose shall constitute one fund.

Mr. PADGETT, Mr. LONGWORTH, and Mr. KRAUS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KRAUS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KRAUS: Page 26, line 24, after the word "orders," strike out "$33,655,372" and insert "$25,924,298"; page 26, line 8, after the word "constructors," strike out "$3,895,776" and insert "$3,246,480"; page 27, line 1, after the word "Corps," strike out "$61,603,059" and insert "$51,335,883"; page 27, line 12, after the word "all," strike out "$120,876,537" and insert "$102,228,065."

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am offering this amendment, having in mind, as I stated when the matter was up on Saturday, that I am just as desirous as any man in this House of keeping an efficient Navy fully manned and ready to serve and defend the country. But, as I called to the attention of the House on last Saturday, the naval organization is becoming essentially a land organization instead of a sea organization. Certainly, the last place where the major portion of the Navy should be is on land, and I am merely taking enough of your time now to call your attention to the details to which my amendment refers. It is prepared on this policy. The appropriations in this bill contemplate that we will have substantially 10,000 officers in the Navy during the next fiscal year. And merely to bring the number down so that the men and officers on shore service bear relatively the same proportion to the total enlisted strength of the Navy as we had in 1916, I am reducing the appropriation to substantially an amount sufficient to pay 8,000 officers for the fiscal year. That is covered by the first item of my amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KRAUS. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the relative apportionment of officers on shore duty to those on sea duty now?

Mr. KRAUS. The figures that I presented last Saturday show that over 4,600 officers were on shore duty on the 1st day of January of this year—more men on shore duty at that time than there were in the entire Navy just prior to the war.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Before the gentleman leaves the officers, does his amendment provide that there should be, in substance, 8,000 instead of 10,000 officers?

Mr. KRAUS. It only provides the money. I am not attempting to enact legislation in this bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understand. What, in effect, would become of those 2,000 officers if the gentleman's amendment is adopted?

Mr. KRAUS. They have temporary appointments, and there is no reason why their services could not be dispensed with. They are not a part of the Regular Navy.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KRAUS. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. Suppose the gentleman does limit the amount provided here for officers, do not the provisions at the end of the bill, where it provides that all of these items shall be disbursed as pay of the Navy and for that purpose shall constitute one fund, permit the department to go ahead and have these officers and pay them out of this fund?

Mr. KRAUS. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that I am proposing to reduce by my amendment several items in the paragraph, and, so far as the appropriation is concerned, what the gentleman from Connecticut says is true. If the department still desires to continue a disproportionate number of officers it could continue the policy, but I know of no way by which it could without legislation be corrected in an appropriation bill.

Mr. TILSON. I will show the gentleman where it could be done. By an amendment put in the bill early this afternoon, on page 27, the retainer pay and active service pay of the members of the Naval Reserve Force, fewer members probably will be trained, and that item will probably be cut down considerably. Why could not they reduce some other item more and the officer item be retained at any figure the department wished to put it?

Mr. KRAUS. I suggest to the gentleman that the item he mentions covers that item by an additional amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KRAUS. The next item covered by my amendment is merely the item of commutation, which is one of calculation, making it relative to the force provided for in the first instance and the reduced force.

The next item in the amendment——

Mr. PELL. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. KRAUS. Certainly.

Mr. PELL. That commutation of quarters is only in reference to officers at sea. That would not affect men on shore at all, in almost every case.

Mr. KRAUS. In practically no instance.

Mr. PELL. In practically no instance. They only get commutation when they are at sea.

Mr. KRAUS. That is all.

Mr. PELL. I wanted to make that clear, that it would have no effect in lessening the proportion or amount.

Mr. KRAUS. The amount of reduction on that item is small. The next item, on page 27, refers to the pay of enlisted men, involving a reduction of about $10,000,000 on that item. And for the purpose of fixing this number I have adopted what is practically the present enlisted strength of the Navy, substantially 100,000 men, practically double the enlisted strength of the Navy just prior to the beginning of the war.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that no one has demonstrated, and none will be able to present any good reason, anything that will appeal to the sound business judgment, coupled with patriotism, which will convince us that a force in excess of 100,000 enlisted men is required by the Navy in peace times. The pending amendment contemplates a total reduction of $18,648,472, and I again submit to my colleagues on this committee that with an appropriation in the amount I am suggesting on these items unquestionably we will fully finance this activity of the organization, so that we shall have a Navy thoroughly prepared for the defense of the country.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the proposal of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KRAUS], as I understand it, is to make appropriation for 100,000 men instead of 120,000, as this bill carries, and for about 8,000 officers, or thereabouts, instead of the number provided for in this bill.

A careful consideration of the present situation of the Navy makes it clear, I think, that that would not be a safe thing to do. We have in the Navy at the present time 100,000 men. About 32,000 of that 100,000 are in the training schools. They are mere boys. Quite a large percentage of the other 68,000 are boys that have enlisted recently and have had but a very brief training in the training schools before being sent to the ships. If you limit the appropriation to provision for 100,000 men you would have to stop all recruiting now. You could not recruit any of the skilled mechanics, of which the Navy is so greatly in need. The trouble at the present time in the Navy is that we have not the men of mature training necessary to handle these difficult machines. I do not suppose there is any more complicated machinery in the world than the machinery of a battleship, the guns, and the electrical appliances, and all that.

Now, if we reduce the amount covered in the bill to a sum which will provide for 100,000 men, we could not recruit any of the skilled mechanics that we hope to get back when we pass the bill providing for an increase in the pay of skilled mechanics in the Navy. So the proposition resolves itself to this: If we accept the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana it would mean that the House would expect to go ahead and run the Navy with the boys that are in the Navy now, unskilled and only partially trained, for many months to come, with all the attendant dangers in the manning and conduct of ships. So that I sincerely hope that no such proposition will prevail.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman will recall that the estimates require 170,000 men. They have ships tied up now and suffering because of lack of men, and the criticism all over the country is that our personnel has gone all to pieces because of the wages, and the great need of the Navy is for more men, and we have provided for only 120,000, when the law authorizes 137,485, plus the Hospital Corps and the Flying Corps, which makes a total of about 143,000.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes; and that gives us a leeway of only about 20,000 for the enlistment of the trained mechanics that we so sorely need.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. KRAUS. Does the gentleman accept the recommendations made by the bureaus, that we have from 1,400 to 1,600 men as the complement of the battleships of the first class in peace times? Is there any necessity for that?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No; not at all. The real difficulty is not the number of men on the ships at all at the present time but the difficulty is that we have not men who know how to run the ships. If we have 100,000 boys in the Navy now, unskilled and untrained, and the gentleman's amendment fixes it so that we can not recruit skilled men, we shall have no relief until these boys grow up.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. KRAUS. The gentleman understands that we have a large number of short-time enlistments, and the short-time enlistments are the very class of material to which the gentleman from Michigan refers, and about the 1st of next July a large number of these enlistments will expire. They have been made since the signing of the armistice, and there will be ample leeway then to reemploy every effective and efficient man formerly in the service who desires to return.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I think the gentleman is mistaken about the short-time enlistments. Most of those have gone out, and those who have been recently recruited, in the last six or seven months, have been recruited for a time to go away beyond the life of this bill; so that if you limit the money to an amount sufficient to cover 100,000 men, you would tie the hands of the Navy as to the employment of skilled mechanics that are needed.

Mr. KRAUS. Is there anything in excess of 10 per cent of these new enlistments for a period of four years?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I do not know as to that.

Mr. KRAUS. As a matter of fact, then, three-fourths of these enlistments have been for the shortest possible time.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is for two years, and if you allow two years, that would carry most of the boys who are now in the Navy beyond the life of this bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As I understand the present situation, it is that our Navy is greatly undermanned, so far as skilled men are concerned.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is true. If we had 100,000 men, properly distributed through the various grades, trained to handle these difficult pieces of machinery we could probably adjust this 100,000 to the needs of the fleet in such a way that we would be able to get along.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of the 100,000 men we now have, something like 35,000 are boys in training schools?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Boys in training schools and others that are on the ships and in training stations have been run through the training stations so fast that they have little or no skill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And we have great difficulty in keeping the necessary skilled men in the service.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is it exactly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman think we can satisfactorily solve this question, even with an increase of pay for those men such as is carried by the bill, so long as we encourage one branch of the Government to bid continually against the Navy, to take away these absolutely necessary men?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will admit that there is a great deal of force in what the gentleman from Ohio says, that the entrance of the Shipping Board into the market for these men makes it very difficult for the Navy to keep the trained, skilled mechanics; but we believe, and the men themselves think, that considering all the other inducements and advantages of remaining in the Navy, the retirement and all that which comes later on if they stay long enough, the proposed increase in pay will be a sufficient inducement to keep them and bring back a good many hundred of those who have already gone out.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And, of course, there is a certain amount of pride in serving in the Navy.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. And the love of the service.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But does not the gentleman think Congress ought to take some legislative action to prevent the Shipping Board from actively going into the market to bid for the services of the skilled men who are absolutely necessary to man our ships, and does not the gentleman think that after all that is the main solution of this difficulty?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I think it is a very serious situation, and that it would be unsafe to reduce the appropriation to a basis of 100,000 men under the present condition existing in the Navy.

Mr. BUTLER. In reply further to the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], I will say that on the 20th day of December there were in the Navy only sufficient skilled workmen, such as the gentleman referred to, for a Navy of 45,000 men. That is all we had. We need sufficient skilled workmen for 65,000 men, and we must have them or else we can not move these ships.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. With reference to bidding for men on the part of the Shipping Board, is it fair to say that they are bidding for the men in the Navy? Are they not going out everywhere and seeking to get men for this service?

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is it fair to say that they are specifically bidding for the men in the Navy?

Mr. BUTLER. They are offering very large wages, and I hope that the time will come when the United States Treasury will no longer furnish any part of the money, and then it will stop.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But they are offering these wages.

Mr. BUTLER. They are offering them to anybody to come into the service of the Shipping Board, and the taxpayers are paying the money, and I for one insist on shutting it off as quickly as possible. Now, when that comes to pass we hope that the men who have gone from the Navy into the merchant marine will be induced to come back, especially after Gov. KELLEY's little bill becomes a law, as we hope it will be soon. I hope that we may bring them back and that we will not have any more reports of explosions on vessels. We did not have them before and I hope this measure will give us back what we should have, and that we will not have any more cases of human life destroyed because of the lack of skilled men. Gov. KELLEY is entirely right. If you reduce these items to the point where our colleague from Indiana has moved that they be reduced, then we will be so badly crippled that you will simply have to write the bill over again. We will have to reduce the number of men in the Navy perhaps to 75,000 men.

Mr. PADGETT. You would absolutely paralyze the whole Naval Establishment.

Mr. BUTLER. There is no question about it. As the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] so well said, we must have the leeway or there is no use of passing the pay bill. There is a considerable fund remaining in this item, as well as in other items, to be returned to the Treasury. If you allow the figures as reported here, if we should not be able to enlist 120,000 men, each month the money will be returned to the Treasury. But please do not cut us off from the chance of getting back the men we have been laboring so hard to secure.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. To what extent is the peace-time complement short of petty officers and enlisted men?

Mr. BUTLER. I made the statement last January—my recollection is that 1,800 enginemen had left the Navy last January. Since that time a lot more have gone. I am only giving you one branch of the workmen.

Mr. BRIGGS. I saw a statement the other day, coming from some officer of the Navy, that they would be afraid to have our Navy engaged in war now on account of the character of the men that they have.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, they had better not rub up against the old Navy, no matter what kind of men run it. [Laughter and applause.] But it is dangerous to have men who can not read the water gauges. The other day a boiler went up because the man did not know how to read the water gauge.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Was not that the fault of the man above him for putting that kind of a man in charge?

Mr. BUTLER. No; that could not be. Of course, it was an accident.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania some time earlier in the day to say that we only had 2,500 officers available for manning the ships. I notice this bill makes provision for 10,000. Objection is made because the gentleman from Indiana seeks to reduce it to 8,000. I think I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that for every thousand men we have 70 officers. If we have 100,000 men, we ought to have 7,000 officers. If we have 120,000 men, we would have 8,400 officers. Why we are providing for 10,000 officers I can not understand.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The Medical Corps and the Staff Corps, in addition to the officers of the line, would make up the difference and more, too.

Mr. MADDEN. If we only have 2,800 now, where do the other 5,200 come in, if we presume to have 8,000. I do not pretend to say that I know much about what the Navy should contain as to the number of men or the number of officers. I do want to see an adequate Navy, but will anybody contend that in a time of profound peace we ought to have an enlisted force of 144,000 men? Does anybody presume to say that we ought to have all these ships manned all the time? Nobody pretends to think that we ought to have them all in commission, and when we say we have some ships laid up at the docks that ought to be the prevailing policy in a time of peace. We ought never to think about having all the ships manned in time of peace. Nobody with an ounce of sense would inaugurate and carry out such a policy. We could alternate the ships that go to sea so that each ship crew would have an opportunity to get practice, and if we alternate we do not need more men than are necessary to man the ships that are active. We can transfer them from the ship that is active to one that is inactive at any time. It does not complicate the job to send a man down the gangplank of one vessel and up the gangplank of another ship.

My judgment, based on sanity and good reason, is that we ought to give careful consideration, while we are considering provisions for a formidable Navy, to the Treasury of the United States and the people from whom we gather the funds to fill the Treasury. The Government of the United States is not a banking institution; it has no money of its own. It can not finance anything except by a tax levy, and God knows that the tax levies have been rather high lately.

Mr. BUTLER. And they are going to be higher.

Mr. MADDEN. If they are higher, there is liable to be some trouble. The people are getting tired of being called upon to the extent they have been called upon, and while we want a Navy to maintain the dignity and preserve the integrity of the United States, I do not think that anybody wants the Navy so large that we have to levy unjust taxes on the backs of the American people.

Of course, the argument is continually made by the advocates of the Navy that we can not sail all of the ships, that we can not send them out in squadrons, that we can not give them that kind of practice that they ought to have, that we have not got all the officers and men that we need, and that we must therefore make the appropriation so large that they will be without limit and that the burdens of taxation will continue to be piled up on the backs of the people regardless of whether they can bear them or not.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A few moments ago the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] brought forward a subject of great interest and of vital importance when he spoke about the fact that the merchant marine service was draining the Navy of its men. That statement is undoubtedly true. There has been this plan suggested, which might change the situation and be productive of good not only to the actual active service but, we might say, to the sentimental service as well: That is to have all the men who are going to be employed by the merchant marine or the Navy enlisted in the Navy for one year and trained by the Navy in naval training camps, of which we have many spread over this country. That would give to every man the discipline of the Navy and it would give him the splendid training which the Navy is capable of giving. Then at the end of the year's training the man would have the option of either remaining by enlisting in the Regular Navy for three years or else he could go into the marine service, whichever he preferred. The marine service would be benefited by having men who had been trained in the naval service, and the Navy, even though its men might go into the merchant service, would have this benefit: That it would have reservists spread all over the country who would know the Navy and who would be willing to go back into the Navy in time of emergency. They would be valuable. The great trouble with trying to synchronize the naval and the marine services is the fact that, the Navy being a Federal proposition and the marine service soon going to be civilian, it seems possible to enact legislation which would cover both services and perform the functions I have outlined.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Perhaps the gentleman answered the query I had in mind in his last sentence. I was about to ask the gentleman why the Shipping Board can take our men out of the Navy when the Shipping Board is a Government board.

Mr. HICKS. At the present time no law has been enacted, and not very stringent regulations have been placed in force in regard to the purloining of men. Competition for men is going on now, and we are being drained ever month. When this matter was suggested to the naval authorities they answered by stating that as the Shipping Board might not continue as a Federal proposition, it seemed hardly worth while to enact legislation that would cover the matter only for a short time.

Mr. FESS. It would seem suicidal to allow one Federal agency to rob another of its expert ability.

Mr. HICKS. And that is exactly what is taking place at the present time. They are paying a higher wage than the Navy is paying and they are getting some of our best men.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. Yes.

Mr. TAGUE. Of the number of officers in the Navy, does the gentleman know how many are connected with the engineering and construction corps?

Mr. HICKS. I could not give that to the gentleman offhand.

Mr. BRIGGS. To what extent does the pay of the Shipping Board exceed that of the Navy?

Mr. HICKS. From 50 to 200 per cent.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. Yes.

Mr. PELL. When the ships go back into private ownership will not the owners of them compete with the Navy in exactly the same way that the Shipping Board is competing to-day?

Mr. HICKS. Yes; but we could not pass a law that would cover Federal operation if the ships were in private hands.

Mr. PELL. But will not the Navy have to face that same competition?

Mr. HICKS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PELL. And we have to be ready for that.

Mr. HICKS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PELL. Whether we keep on owning the ships or not.

Mr. HICKS. Undoubtedly.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. TILSON). The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, if I can, I want to clarify the situation a little. The question was asked about officers and men. The existing law provides that the permanent enlisted strength of the Navy shall be 137,485 plus sixty-five one-hundreds of 1 per cent of the enlisted and commissioned personnel for the hospital corps, and then a small number for the flying corps, but the number of officers is a percentage on the 137,485. For the line it is 4 per cent, and it would entitle the line of the Navy to 5,499 officers. As a matter of fact, we have only 2,850, and during the war in order to supply that deficiency and meet the requirements the act of May 22, 1917, was passed, which provided for temporary officers.

Now, then, out of the 143,000, in round numbers, of enlisted men we have about 100,000 at the present time. As I stated a moment ago, in the line of the Navy having an authorized strength of 5,499 line officers we have 2,850, but then there are the staff officers, which constitute the Medical Corps, the Construction Corps, the Pay Corps, the Engineer Corps, Yards and Docks, and Steam Engineering. Now, those are based upon the percentage of the number of line officers, all of them provided and fixed by law, and in the line, as I stated, we are to-day 2,500 officers short. That is being made good by the provision of law authorizing temporary appointments until it is made good by the regular provision of law, the great bulk of whom come through the graduates at Annapolis. In order to meet that we increased the authorization a few years ago from two appointments to each Member of Congress to five. That increased the total number there about 400, until now we have at the academy something like 2,200. The authorized number at the academy is something over 3,000, but they are never completely full. We are trying to fill up that gap the best we can. Now, they said, what about officers? What do you want with officers? That is one of the most important elements of the naval situation. The number of officers is based upon the authorized strength, not upon the actual strength, because if it were based upon the actual strength it would be fluctuating from day to day and from month to month and year to year, and we would have nothing permanent. We would have no stable organization. Now, I want to emphasize that. With an enlisted personnel to take care of the ships, 100,000 men would leave the Navy paralyzed in its activities and in its legitimate functions and duties.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, on the question of the shortage of officers, I think that the Navy makes a great mistake by keeping the number of officers they do in the navy yards of the country. I have noticed in the navy yards in my district and other navy yards I have visited that there are a great many officers in the Engineering Corps and in the Construction Corps that could be better occupied if they were outside and doing work aboard ships.

Mr. PADGETT. There is no work for them to do aboard ship. Their work is in the navy yards.

Mr. TAGUE. They do not help the work in the navy yards. From my observation, many times they have been more of a nuisance than a help to the workmen who are working there from day to day. Go to any of the navy yards of the country to-day and ask the mechanics employed there and they will tell you that their work is interfered with a great part of the time by some of these officers, who should be doing other work, such as training young men for the service that is so much needed aboard ship. Employ them in training young seamen to become mechanics, if they will, or let them lay out work aboard ship for the young men who are in the service. The work at the navy yards could be better done, and is being better done, where they have civilians in charge, rather than where they have officers in charge.

Mr. BUTLER. Would the gentlemen take all the officers from the yards?

Mr. TAGUE. Not all of them; not at all. I would leave a supervisory force in the yards. I do not believe it is necessary in every department to have from 4 to 10 officers in charge where there are only four or five hundred men doing work. I do not believe it is necessary to have men who are highly skilled mechanics, who are able to do the work, are now laying out this work, and men who actually do the work in the mechanical lines being interfered with by young men who have not had the practical experience and are only out of school. These are the men who are now directing the mechanics in the different yards as to what they must do and how to do the work. If that work was left to civilian mechanics and left to the men who know the work, who are brought up in the work, and who know how to apply themselves to the work, the Government, to my mind, would be better off and the Navy would be far better paid if we took those officers out of the yards and put them where they would be of service in training the men to go aboard ship and perform the service of engineers, firemen, electricians, and other work, which is so badly needed aboard the ships at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KRAUS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PADGETT: Page 27, line 15, after the word "fund," insert: "Provided, That retainer pay provided by existing law shall not be paid to any officer of the Naval Reserve Force who declines and fails to train as provided by law during the year for which he declines to train."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provisions, Navy: For provisions and commuted rations for the seamen and marines, which commuted rations may be paid to caterers of messes, in case of death or desertion, upon orders of the commanding officers, commuted rations for officers on sea duty (other than commissioned officers of the line, Medical and Supply Corps, chaplains, chief boatswains, chief gunners, chief carpenters, chief machinists, chief pay clerks, and chief sailmakers) and midshipmen at 68 cents per diem, and commuted rations stopped on account of sick in hospital and credited at the rate of 68 cents per ration to the naval hospital fund; subsistence of officers and men unavoidably detained or absent from vessels to which attached under orders (during which subsistence rations to be stopped on board ship and no credit for commutation therefor be given); subsistence of men on detached duty; subsistence of officers and men of the naval auxiliary service; subsistence of members of the Naval Reserve Force during period of active service; and for subsistence of female nurses and Navy and Marine Corps general courts-martial prisoners undergoing imprisonment with sentences of dishonorable discharge from the service at the expiration of such confinement: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to commute rations for such general courts-martial prisoners in such amounts as seem to him proper, which may vary in accordance with the location of the naval prison, but which shall in no case exceed 30 cents per diem for each ration so commuted; and for the purchase of United States Army emergency rations as required; in all, $26,000,000, to be available until the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PADGETT: Page 27, line 24, strike out "68 cents" and insert in lieu thereof "$1.08."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, the reason I offer that is that the Military Academy bill, which has passed and become a law, fixes the commutation of rations for the cadets at West Point at $1.08, raising it from 68 cents, and this is just to make them identical.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee say that that is the difference in the cost between the time it was fixed at 68 cents and now?

Mr. PADGETT. This is the next fiscal year.

Mr. MADDEN. Does this more than cover the cost?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir. I do not think $1.08 a day is excessive for a man to live on.

Mr. MADDEN. I know it is not. Of course, I do not think it is myself, but what does it cost? That is what I want to know.

Mr. PADGETT. It goes to them in the nature of compensation. They get an allowance now of 68 cents——

Mr. MADDEN. I know.

Mr. PADGETT (continuing). In making the compensation at the academy. This credits them with $1.08 a day, instead of 68 cents a day, and it has been costing them far more than the 68 cents.

Mr. MADDEN. How much does it cost? That is what I want to find out.

Mr. PADGETT. I could not give it to you exactly. It varies from month to month, but it is, I should say, more than $1.08. But this would make it identical, and would keep the two institutions on a parity, which we have always done.

Mr. MADDEN. By the two institutions you mean the Military Academy and the Naval Academy?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. The Congress made it $1.08 at the Military Academy, and this makes it the same at the Naval Academy.

Mr. MADDEN. They did it in conference. They did not do it on the floor.

Mr. PADGETT. It was in the bill reported by the committee, agreed to by the House, and not changed by the Senate.

Mr. McKEOWN. I notice on page 28, line 17, a provision there in reference to court-martial prisoners, that the ration shall in no case exceed 30 cents per diem. Does the gentleman think 30 cents per diem sufficient in that case to cover the rations?

Mr. PADGETT. Really I do not know. So far as I know we have had no evidence and no complaints. They get their supplies from the general wholesale purchasers in the department, and there is not much hotel accommodation required in connection with it. We have no complaint about it.

Mr. McKEOWN. The thing I want to call the gentleman's attention to is that the officers have the right to buy at cost.

Mr. PADGETT. These are not officers. These are midshipmen at the academy.

Mr. McKEOWN. And you allow them $1.08?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Do you not think that this 30 cents per diem ought to be increased for the enlisted men, the men who are unfortunate enough to be court-martialed?

Mr. PADGETT. Just leaving it to me, I think it should be. But, as I have said, we got no requests and received no complaints of the existing condition, and there was no claim made that they were not able to take care of them properly at that price. For that reason the committee has not recommended an increase. But in the other case it was shown that it was necessary.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment on page 28, line 17. I move to strike out the figures "30" and insert "50."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McKEOWN: Page 28, line 17, strike out the figures "30" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "50."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that. I would like to look it up. Is not that fixed by statute?

Mr. PADGETT. I think so.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to apologize for not knowing, but I am under the impression that that figure is fixed by statute.

Mr. McKEOWN. If it is, it is not subject to a point of order here.

Mr. BUTLER. I think it would be.

Mr. McKEOWN. They have increased the allowance to the midshipmen at the Academy, and 30 cents to feed a man in jail is not enough.

Mr. BUTLER. How much does the gentleman desire to raise this?

Mr. McKEOWN. From 30 cents to 50. They do not have to expend the whole amount. It is "not to exceed the amount."

Mr. BUTLER. That is for a man in jail?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I will not raise the point of order against that. Anybody else can make it.

Mr. BLANTON. This is for each ration.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on the point of order. What is the point of order that the gentleman makes?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] made the point of order. Is that the case?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so understand. Did the gentleman from Ohio make the point of order?

Mr. FESS. I shall not make the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I do make the point of order until the matter is considered by a committee and passed upon. I think we should not just hurriedly jump up here and change this statute covering a big item of this kind until a committee has had some chance or opportunity to pass upon it.

Mr. DUPRÉ. This Committee of the Whole will consider it if the gentleman will give us the opportunity.

Mr. BLANTON. This committee is composed of about 40 members, when there ought to be 435.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The Naval Committee has only 21 members.

Mr. McKEOWN. What is the point of order against feeding the enlisted man who is in prison?

Mr. BLANTON. That it is fixed by statute, and that this is an attempt to put legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. McKEOWN. What is the statute?

Mr. BLANTON. This is 30 cents for each ration.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we may proceed to the reading of the next paragraph, with the privilege of returning later to pass upon the point of order on this paragraph. I confess that I do not know whether this is provided for by statute or not.

Mr. BLANTON. I think we should have a new shift, anyhow, and I make the point of no quorum. It is 5 o'clock.

Mr. BUTLER. I know; but we have been here this whole day, and——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas withdraw his point of order?

Mr. PADGETT. Let us go ahead and work.

Mr. BLANTON. I think we should have a new shift.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I have discovered that the provision is not statutory.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Texas insists on his point that there is no quorum here, I will move that the committee do now rise. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MANN of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13108) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 299. Joint resolution extending the term of the National Screw Thread Commission for a period of two years from March 21, 1920.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SMALL, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. HARDY of Texas, for two weeks after to-morrow, on account of private business and to meet appointment to discuss political issues.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 23, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee that Thou hast ordained that all men shall be free, that Thy law stands guard over the rights of men, and it is the divine will that we shall enjoy the largest and fullest and divinest freedom. We thank Thee that the freedom Thou dost contemplate for us goes beyond that which we can transcribe into the laws of this or any other Nation. Thou dost look for the freedom of the Spirit, the freedom with which Thou canst make men free through Thy Son. Grant us this self-mastery as God gives us grace for the conflict, and direct us in the use of all our power set free. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. NELSON and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have a copy of resolutions adopted on the 17th day of March, 1920, at the Liberty Hut, in this city, at a mass meeting of the United Irish Societies of the District of Columbia. I had intended to ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD, but I find that the objection to printing such resolutions is being enforced. I wish to say that I am in entire sympathy with that course, and I shall not ask that an exception be made in this case, but I do ask that the resolutions may be noted in the RECORD, and that they may be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 12272, being the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest to the Senator that we have the morning business first.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Finance, to go to the calendar.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota if he will not allow us to run through the formal morning business. I think it will take only a few minutes, and then he can prefer his request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota withdraw his request?

Mr. CURTIS. I understood the Senator from North Dakota to say that he would withhold the request until the morning business was concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from North Dakota withdraws his request for unanimous consent.

Mr. GRONNA. I withdraw the request for the present.

TUNGSTEN ORES.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4437) to provide revenue for the Government and to promote the production of tungsten ores and manufactures thereof in the United States, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 487) thereon.

INTERMENT OF SOLDIERS IN NATIONAL CEMETERIES.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, on the 16th of March the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] introduced the bill (S. 4082) to amend section 4878 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the act of March 3, 1897. The bill relates to the burial of soldiers in national cemeteries. By inadvertence the bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It should have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I therefore move that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

THE SHOE INDUSTRY.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, on yesterday, on behalf of the Committee on Manufactures, I submitted a report on Senate resolution 317, proposing an investigation by the Committee on Manufactures into the cost of shoes. I asked at the time that the resolution go to the calendar, but the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] suggested that it should go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I therefore asked unanimous consent to have it sent to that committee. On looking through the RECORD, however, I find that on the 16th of June last the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, reported favorably a resolution offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], being Senate resolution 65, which gives the Committee on Manufactures, or any subcommittee thereof, during the Sixty-sixth Congress the right to send for persons, books, and papers, to employ a stenographer, and to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject before said committee.

This resolution directs the Committee on Manufactures to investigate a specific matter and places the subject before said committee. Then if the committee should find it necessary to hold hearings, they have general authority to do so under Senate resolution 65 previously adopted. I therefore ask that the Committee on Contingent Expenses be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution and that it be placed on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. As I understood the Senator, he said that the resolution to which he referred as having been reported by the Senator from New York was an authorization applicable to the Sixty-fifth Congress.

Mr. McNARY. To the Sixty-sixth. I will read the resolution if desired; it is brief.

Mr. LODGE. The resolution was passed at the last session and covers everything.

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. If it applies to the Sixty-sixth Congress, very well; but I thought the Senator said the Sixty-fifth.

Mr. LODGE. The resolution was general in its authority, and was adopted last June.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator from Oregon to read it.

Mr. McNARY. The resolution adopted last June reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-sixth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. STERLING:

A bill (S. 4121) relating to the relinquishment by and an allotment of land to Raymond T. Bonnin, a Yankton Sioux Indian; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 4122) for the relief of Ella M. Guedry; to the Committee on Claims.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at 12 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.). The morning business is closed.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of H. R. 12272, the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator from North Dakota, as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, knows that the Federal Reserve Board is very anxious to have Senate bill 3958 acted upon. It is an important measure, and comes here with the unanimous report of the committee, and I think it has the unanimous report of the Committee on Banking and Currency in the House. Unless there is opposition to the bill, it seems to me it ought to be considered in the morning hour in the immediate future. If it will take any time, of course, I shall not ask for its consideration now. If there is no objection——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I think the Senator can be assured that that bill will meet considerable opposition. I think it will take quite a time to pass that proposed amendment to the Federal reserve act.

Mr. GRONNA. I have understood that there are quite a number of Senators who are opposed to the bill, and that it will be debated at length.

Mr. McLEAN. Of course, if that is so, I can not expect it to be considered now; but I give notice that to-morrow or the next day I shall move to have the bill considered, because it is such an important measure, and if the Senate is not inclined to act upon it I want the Senate to take the responsibility. It seems to me that it is a most salutary measure, and if the Federal Reserve Board is to have the power conferred by the bill in time to be of benefit it should be considered in the immediate future.

I give notice now that to-morrow or on the following day, or as soon as an opportunity presents itself, I shall move to have this bill considered by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of H. R. 12272. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

CIVIL-SERVICE RETIREMENT.

Mr. STERLING. Relative to the unfinished business—Senate bill 1699—I wish to say that there were several amendments made to that bill in Committee of the Whole, and one quite important amendment. I think it may be of benefit to have the bill reprinted as amended, and I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 1699 be printed with the amendments already agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator refers to the civil-service retirement bill?

Mr. STERLING. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I have prepared a series of amendments to that bill, and I shall have to do all of that work over if the bill is reprinted, although if the Secretary will use the original bill I have no objection at all to having it reprinted with the amendments suggested.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted, as I understand, the Senator from South Dakota has asked for a reprint of the bill showing the amendments heretofore agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. I gave notice some time ago of a substitute amendment which I would offer, and it was printed. Since that time I have thought of several changes to it, one reducing the maximum of the assessment from 8 per cent to 6 per cent; and I also intend to incorporate the provisions of the bill presented by the chairman of the committee relating to disabilities incurred during the service, and with very slight modifications it is the same. I ask leave to submit an amendment containing these modifications and that it be printed and lie on the table for the further action of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request of the Senator from South Dakota is granted, and also the request of the Senator from Ohio.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill now before the Senate for action on the committee amendments.

Mr. CURTIS. I offer an amendment to be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be received and printed and lie on the table.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the head of "Department of Agriculture," subhead "Office of the Secretary," on page 2, line 4, after "$12,000," to strike out "Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $5,000" and insert "two Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture, at $5,000 each."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I remember, this same question arose at the time we had the last appropriation bill up for consideration. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota whether the Senate passed favorably upon that matter the last time and it went out in conference, or did the Senate refuse to increase the number of Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture?

Mr. GRONNA. The Agricultural Department has two Assistant Secretaries now, under the present law, but the House committee provided for only one Assistant Secretary in the pending bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I had the impression that that was the case, but I was wondering whether this bill as it came from the House reduced the number that exists to-day?

Mr. GRONNA. No; it is just the same as the present law.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator really think there should be two Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I believe I may say that it is the unanimous opinion of the committee that we ought to have two Assistant Secretaries at this time. There is a great deal of very important work to be done in the Department of Agriculture. There are some new matters that necessarily must be taken up. I know of no department where the Secretary is more overworked than in the Department of Agriculture. It is believed by the officers of the department that there ought to be two Assistant Secretaries.

I do not regard this as an increase in the expenditures of the Department of Agriculture. There is to-day a position known as Assistant to the Secretary. I am quite sure that the Senator from Utah is as familiar with the conditions there as I am. There is one young man there who is very efficient and who knows everything about the department. I think it is highly important that the department should retain the services of at least one man who knows all about the workings not only of the Secretary's office but of the entire department.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am fully aware of the ability of the young man to whom the Senator refers, and I want to go further than the Senator does and state that I think he knows more about the Agricultural Department than the Secretary himself and all the Assistant Secretaries, or the chief clerk.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I think his name ought to go in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to put his name in the RECORD as far as I am concerned. I have reference to Mr. Harrison.

Mr. OVERMAN. What position does he hold?

Mr. GRONNA. He is now Assistant to the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 23, before the word "clerks," to strike out "seventeen" and insert "twenty"; in line 24, before the word "clerks," to strike out "twenty-three" and insert "thirty-one"; in line 25, after "$1,440," to strike out "2 clerks, at $1,100 each; 1 clerk, $1,020"; on page 3, line 2, before the word "clerks," to strike out "eighteen" and insert "seven"; in the same line, after the word "each" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "2 clerks, at $840 each"; on page 4, line 2, after the word "machinist," to strike out "$900" and insert "$1,200," so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, office of the Secretary of Agriculture: Secretary of Agriculture, $12,000; 2 Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture, at $5,000 each; solicitor, $5,000; chief clerk, $3,000, and $500 additional as custodian of buildings; private secretary to the Secretary of Agriculture, $2,500; executive clerk, $2,250; executive clerk, $2,100; stenographer and executive clerk to the Secretary of Agriculture, $2,250; private secretary to the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $2,250; 1 appointment clerk, $2,000; 1 officer in charge of supplies, $2,000; 1 inspector, $3,000; 1 inspector, $2,250; 1 attorney, $3,500; 2 attorneys, at $3,250 each; 2 law clerks, at $3,000 each; 2 law clerks, at $2,750 each; 4 law clerks, at $2,500 each; 8 law clerks, at $2,250 each; 1 law clerk, $2,200; 5 law clerks, at $2,000 each; 3 law clerks, at $1,800 each; 2 law clerks, at $1,600 each; 1 superintendent of telegraph and telephones, $2,000; 1 telegraph and telephone operator, $1,600; 1 assistant chief clerk and captain of the watch, $1,800; 1 clerk, $2,000; 5 clerks, class 4; 14 clerks, class 3; 20 clerks, class 2; 31 clerks, class 1; 1 accountant and bookkeeper, $2,000; 1 clerk, $1,440; 5 clerks, at $1,000 each; 7 clerks, at $900 each; 14 messengers or laborers, at $840 each; 12 messengers or laborers, at $720 each; 1 messenger or laborer, $660; 1 mechanical superintendent, $2,500; 1 mechanical assistant, $1,800; 1 mechanical assistant, $1,400; 1 mechanical assistant, $1,380; 1 engineer, $1,400; 1 electrical engineer and draftsman, $1,200; 1 chief engineer, $1,800; 2 assistant engineers, at $1,200 each; 2 assistant engineers, at $1,000 each; 10 firemen, at $1,080 each; 1 fireman, $840; 4 firemen, at $720 each; 1 chief elevator conductor, $840; 16 elevator conductors, at $720 each; 3 elevator conductors, at $600 each; 1 superintendent of shops, $1,400; 1 cabinet shop foreman, $1,200; 5 cabinetmakers or carpenters, at $1,200 each; 3 cabinetmakers or carpenters, at $1,100 each; 9 cabinetmakers or carpenters, at $1,020 each; 3 cabinetmakers or carpenters, at $900 each; 1 instrument maker, $1,200; 1 electrician, $1,100; 2 electrical wiremen, at $1,100 each; 1 electrician or wireman, $1,000; 1 electrical wireman, $900; 1 electrician's helper, $840; 3 electrician's helpers, at $720 each; 1 painter, $1,020; 1 painter, $1,000; 5 painters, at $900 each; 5 plumbers or steamfitters, at $1,020 each; 2 plumber's helpers, at $840 each; 2 plumber's helpers, at $720 each; 1 blacksmith, $900; 1 elevator machinist, $1,200; 1 tinner or sheet-metal worker, $1,100; 1 tinner's helper, $720; 1 lieutenant of the watch, $1,000; 2 lieutenants of the watch, at $960 each; 73 watchmen, at $720 each; 4 mechanics, at $1,200 each; 1 mechanic, $1,000; 1 foreman of stable, $1,080; 1 skilled laborer, $1,000; 3 skilled laborers, at $960 each; 2 skilled laborers, at $900 each; 2 skilled laborers, at $840 each; 2 skilled laborers, at $720 each; 1 janitor, $900; 13 messengers or laborers, at $600 each; 7 messenger boys, at $600 each; 22 messenger boys, at $480 each; 1 messenger boy, $360; 1 charwoman, $540; 3 charwomen, at $480 each; 1 charwoman, $360; 16 charwomen, at $240 each; for extra labor and emergency employments, $12,480.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I simply want to ask the reason for these increases in the number of clerks?

Mr. GRONNA. In justice to the Senate I think I ought to make a brief statement with reference to the statutory roll.

It will be found that in some of these bureaus there is an increase in the number of employees, but it was worked out by the department in this way: The department found that it was absolutely impossible to keep some of the low-paid men in the department, and the Secretary submitted an estimate carrying a total reduction in the number of clerks of from 190 to 195.

Mr. POMERENE. That is, in the entire department?

Mr. GRONNA. In the entire department. But the decrease in the amount appropriated was only $6,500. In other words, the clerks who have been drawing less than $1,200 have, in a way, been advanced. There is quite a reduction in the number of clerks, but the reduction in the amount appropriated is not very much less than the amount carried in the bill as passed by the House.

Mr. POMERENE. Am I to understand from the Senator's statement that their salaries have been increased?

Mr. GRONNA. The salaries, where it applies to clerks below $1,200, have been increased. It was stated by the Secretary and by his assistant that they believe it to be in the interest of efficiency, and that ultimately there will be a large saving to the deparment, and much better work will be done.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am not taking exception to the increases in the pay of these clerks, because I have not been able to understand quite how some of them have been able to live.

Mr. GRONNA. I am very glad to hear the Senator say that.

Mr. POMERENE. That was not the matter I had in mind. I noticed an increase in the number of clerks. If, to do justice to these clerks it is necessary to increase their salaries, I am quite willing to do it. I have felt that way about it for a number of years. I think the Federal Government ought to be ashamed of the low pay which is accorded to many of the clerks, when in private life for practically the same class of work very material advances are given over and above the rates prevailing in the departments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that on page 2 of the bill, lines 23 and 24, there is an increase of 11 clerks. That means that there is an increase of 3 clerks of class 2, at $1,400 per annum. There is an increase of 8 clerks of class 1, at $1,200. On page 3, line 2, the Senator will notice that "18" is stricken out and "7" inserted. That is a decrease of 11 clerks, at $900 each. Or, in other words, this particular item means that there is a reduction of 3 clerks, at $900, and an increase of 3 clerks to $1,400. There have been 8 clerks cut out at $900 and 8 put in at $1,200.

Mr. POMERENE. Then, if I understand correctly the real effect of these changes, it gives an opportunity for an advancement of a clerk from a lower grade to a higher grade, but it does not increase the salaries of the several grades?

Mr. GRONNA. No; it does not.

Mr. SMOOT. The salaries of clerks of classes 1, 2, 3, and 4 are fixed by the statute.

Mr. GRONNA. I have here a complete statement of the statutory salaries and the readjustment by the department. It shows the number of places dropped in the various bureaus. The total number of clerks dropped is 685. The total amount of money involved for those 685 is $595,160. The number of places added is 467, and the total amount of money involved is $588,580.

That shows that there is a net decrease of $6,580 in the appropriation.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. Has any provision been made by the committee for the bonus for these clerks, which we gave to them in the last appropriation act?

Mr. GRONNA. The committee has not taken the bonus into consideration. The committee felt that that was a matter which would be taken care of in a general way and which would apply to all salaries below the $2,500 grade.

Mr. WARREN. That will apply to all Government employees except Post Office employees.

Mr. SMOOT. That subject matter is now before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GRONNA. If I may have the attention of the Senator from Ohio, I also want to put into the RECORD a summary, for the information of the Senate:

READJUSTMENT BY THE DEPARTMENT.

Total number of places dropped	685
Total number of places added	467
Net decrease	218

And so forth.

ADDITIONAL CHANGES BY THE SENATE COMMITTEE.

Total number of places added	28
Total number of places dropped	2
Net increase	26

The total amount of money involved for the 28 places is $47,420.

The total amount of money involved for the 2 places dropped is $2,120.

Making a net increase there of $45,300.

A recapitulation of this readjustment will show the following:

Total number of places added	495
Total number of places dropped	687
Net decrease	192

One hundred and ninety-two was the decrease which was made in the first instance; but there have been two places added, I will say to the Senator from Ohio.

The total amount of money involved for the 495 places is $636,000, and the total involved for the 687 places is $597,280, or a net increase of $38,720. But of this number, 14 are transferred from the lump sum to the several bureaus, involving $23,680, and the lump sums of those bureaus have been correspondingly reduced. In many places where there are increases in the number of employees it is simply a transfer from the lump sum to the statutory roll.

I felt that I should make this statement for the information of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator know what became of the saving in the lump sum by that number of transfers? Every dollar of the lump sum was expended, was it not?

Mr. GRONNA. I understand that there is no surplus whatever.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 17, after the word "Agriculture," to strike out "$466,940" and insert "$471,240," so as to make the clause read:

Total for office of the Secretary of Agriculture, $471,240.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 19, to strike out the subhead "Office of Farm Management" and insert "Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics," on page 4, line 21, after the word "salaries," to strike out "Office of Farm Management" and insert "Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics"; in line 23, after the words "chief of," to strike out "office" and insert "bureau"; in line 25, after the words "class 3," to insert "3 clerks, at $1,500 each"; on page 5, line 1, before the word "clerks," to strike out "three" and insert "six"; and in the same line, before the words "clerks, class 1," to strike out "eight" and insert "eighteen"; in line 3, before the word "clerks," to strike out "ten" and insert "twelve"; in the same line, after the word "each," to strike out "9 clerks, at $900 each; 1 clerk or map tracer, $840"; in line 10, after "$1,200," to strike out "2 draftsmen, at $900 each"; and in line 11, after the words "in all," to strike out "$72,130" and insert "$84,090," so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics: One chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 assistant to the chief, $2,520; 1 executive assistant, $2,250; 2 clerks, class 4; 2 clerks, class 3; 3 clerks at $1,500 each; 6 clerks, class 2; 18 clerks, class 1; 3 clerks, at $1,100 each; 4 clerks, at $1,080 each; 1 clerk or draftsman, $1,020; 12 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 messenger or laborer, $720; 1 messenger boy, $660; 3 messenger boys, at $480 each; 1 charwoman, $480; 5 charwomen, at $240 each; 1 library assistant, $1,440; 1 library assistant, $900; 1 photographer, $1,400; 1 cartographer, $1,500; 1 clerk or draftsman, $1,440; 1 draftsman, $1,200; in all, $84,090.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 12, after the words "General expenses," to strike out "Office of Farm Management" and insert "Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics," so as to make the clause read:

General expenses, Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics: For the employment of persons in the city of Washington and elsewhere, furniture, supplies, traveling expenses, rent outside of the District of Columbia, and all other expenses necessary in carrying out the work herein authorized, as follows:

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it seems to me that there is no need of having the words "Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics" repeated. It is under the head of "Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics," and starts with "salaries," then "general expenses," and then the "total." Of course it will not hurt to leave them in, but it is a repetition of words which are not at all necessary. Does the Senator object to having repetitions eliminated?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, it was suggested to the committee that it would be advisable to have those subheadings, and we could see no real reason for not having them.

Mr. SMOOT. It is under the general head of "Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics."

Mr. GRONNA. Of course, the intention of the committee was to change it from an office to a bureau. The committee was unanimous in making this a bureau and not an office.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me, he will find that the style of the bill throughout.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps it is in the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is.

Mr. SMOOT. But I still insist that is is not necessary. The total appropriation is made for the Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics, and when it is for salaries it is made under the head of salaries.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think the Senator will find the reason for that is that under the head of, for instance, salaries of the Weather Bureau, you go ahead a page or two, and then you come to another subdivision, and one reading the bill would have to turn back to find under what head this subdivision occurs, whereas for convenience of reference, if you will repeat the bureau under which it is, it expedites the reading and understanding of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will notice on the same page—page 5—line 4, beginning on page 23, the title, and then it is repeated again, "General expenses, Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics." The whole appropriation is under the general heading.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But it will happen that where you read two or three pages, you come to that subdivision, and unless you repeat what heading it is you will have to turn back, and it creates confusion. This has been the custom on this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no confusion in other appropriation bills. I am not going to make any captious objection to it, but really I believe it is not the general rule followed in appropriation bills.

Mr. GRONNA. I am glad to hear the Senator say that he is not going to object to it. Let me say that I take it that each committee is rather jealous of the form of bill which it has presented, and, of course, it is so with this committee. The committee believed it should be done, and I want to say that, leaving out the chairman of the committee, the membership of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is comprised of some of the ablest lawyers and some of the ablest business men in the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. But this is not a question of law.

Mr. GRONNA. For that reason we have a sort of pride in the form of the bill which the committee have presented, and I am very glad to know that the Senator from Utah is not going to insist on his objection.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I am not going to interfere with the pride of any committee as to the wording of its bill. I want to say now that it is not necessary. Does the change of this from "Office of Farm Management" to "Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics" mean the beginning of an expansion of work with new divisions within a bureau and the expenditure of a great deal more money in the future than there is provided for this year?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to say that one important particular in which the work of this bureau is intended to be expanded relates to the cost of production. They have worked out at least the basis of a system, I think a scientific system, of ascertaining the cost of production of staple farm products. There is no work of greater importance to the agriculture of this country. Farming has come to be a business. Perhaps there was a time when it was not in a strictly scientific sense a business, but it is a business now and responds as promptly to the influence of market quotations and prices and cost of production as any other business.

It can not be placed upon a scientific basis, however, until the cost of producing staple commodities is ascertained, and ascertained not for a single year but ascertained during a series of years. Agriculture is perhaps exceptional in this particular, that the cost of production for a single year, if accurately ascertained, would be of very little service, owing to weather risk and wide fluctuation in the output per acre.

I think there is nothing more important than the work now being undertaken by the bureau, and it will constitute a justification on the part of the farmers of the country for the claim which they make and the protest which they make that they ought not to be classified among the profiteers of the country. The cost of producing farm products has increased enormously. The consumers of the country as a rule are fair when they understand the facts. The consumers have voluntarily tabooed having convict-made goods in this country. The consumers have tabooed goods produced in sweat shops. If the consumers understand that the farmers have been selling their goods for less than the cost of production, they will not complain at the advance in the price of agricultural products.

It is in order to secure justice for the farmers of the country that this work is being undertaken, and I think it is worthy of a word of commendation and worthy of the support of Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would not take issue with one word the Senator has said, but I can not see why that work could not be done under the designation of "Office of Farm Management" as well as it can be done under the designation "Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics." I do not believe it makes a particle of difference in work or results.

Mr. GORE. I think the Senator is entirely correct. There is very little in a name, but really it is rather a matter of economics than a matter of management, and that is the particular point to which I was addressing myself.

Mr. SMOOT. The only reason why I rose on the question at all is because whenever there is a bureau established by the Government, that bureau immediately finds out how many persons are employed in some other bureau, and the head of the bureau generally concludes that no bureau shall have more employees than the bureau over which he presides.

The changing of a name will make no difference as to the results of the work, no matter how important the work is. I recognize that this is very important work, but I could not help wondering whether the changing of the name meant the building up of a bureau to employ just as many people as are employed in any other bureau of the Government.

I want to call the attention of the Senate again to the fact that the employees in the District of Columbia are not decreasing. What was the result in February? From February 1 to February 29 of the year 1920, when we expected that there would be a decrease in the number of employees in the District of Columbia, we find that there was an increase during that month of 789 employees in the District of Columbia alone. When will the decrease begin? Not as long as we give money to pay them will there be a decrease. I want the Senate to understand that the only way that it will be accomplished is to take the ax and cut the life out of such appropriations, particularly out of the lump-sum appropriations. From lump-sum appropriations comes the wicked waste of public money.

You will find that out of lump-sum appropriations granted to the Public Health Service employees are paid out of that fund and detailed to other departments. We appropriated money for the activities of the Public Health Service, and we find to-day details from the Public Health Service to other departments of the Government. When they are paid out of a lump-sum appropriation they are paid whatever the head of the particular division thinks his favorite ought to be paid.

I should like to see the employees of this Government who do the work receive the pay. No wonder there is dissatisfaction among the clerks of the departments. There is no chance whatever of promotion unless a chief clerk in a department so decides. The reclassification report that is made to the Senate, instead of minimizing that evil, is magnifying it and multiplying it many, many times over. As long as there stands at the head of every bureau and every department of the Government a chief clerk who has the power to decide when and how there should be a promotion made, there is going to be dissatisfaction among the employees of the Government. Whenever I see a change in legislation, either by designation as to class of employment or changing the word "office" to "bureau," as suggested, if history is to be repeated, it means the increase of future appropriations.

Perhaps I ought to have said this on a different bill than the Agricultural appropriation bill, because I recognize that the old-established departments like the Interior Department and the Agricultural Department, whose employees are generally paid from a statutory roll, are the departments in which the employees are suffering to-day. They are the ones that have not been taken care of like the employees of the new bureaus established since the war began. There are departments where many employees are not only earning their salaries but earning a great deal more than the Government of the United States pays them.

There ought to be a house cleaning, and the clerks that do the work for the Government ought to be paid for the work they do. Those that do no work or very little ought to be separated from the service, as the service would be better off without them.

It is rather interesting to notice the report of the Civil Service Commission and see the additions to the departments, divisions, and bureaus of the Government and the separations therefrom. No one can read the report and not wonder why increases of employees should be. You can not defend them. Instead of having the number of employees in the district now over 104,000, they ought to be steadily decreased. I had three employees from one of the departments of the Government come into my office the other day and beg me to get a transfer for them to some other department. "Transfer us to some department where we can do some work."

They stated that in the division where they were employed, where 31 employees were supposed to work, they had not averaged the writing of three letters a day for the last three months; yet when a question is asked about such a situation the answer one gets is, "Do you want to turn these girls out on the street?" No, Mr. President, I do not want to turn them out on the street, but I want them to go home where they ought to be, if there is no work here in the District of Columbia for them.

So far as I am concerned, I desire that provision shall be made on some of the appropriation bills before we shall have concluded their consideration appropriating sufficient money to pay the railroad fare of all of the unnecessary employees of the Government from the District of Columbia to their homes and giving them a limited time to accept the offer. I desire to say, however, that they are not going to go; they will not leave the District of Columbia so long as they can remain here.

While I recognize the services of many of the employees who have come here during war time, I also recognize that the time has arrived when their retention is doing the Government of the United States no good, nor is it doing a great number of this vast herd of employees any good.

Mr. President, I merely desired to say this much at this particular time. I have no objection especially to changing the designation of this branch of the Agricultural Department—perhaps it will make no difference in the near future—for I have a great deal more confidence in the old established departments of the Government than I have in the divisions and bureaus which have been more recently created.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish the committee might be content to retain the older and simpler title "Farm Management," which covers everything. There is no need of adopting such a pompous phrase as "farm economics." The designation "Farm Management" is sufficiently comprehensive. I think also the danger in substituting the word "bureau" for the word "office" is a real danger. I believe that the advantages are purely imaginary, and its adoption will lead to constant pressure for additional places. We refer to the "office of the Secretary of Agriculture," and it does not seem to be humiliating, though he is the chief of the whole establishment. The gentleman, whoever he may be, who is the chief of the office or the Division of Farm Management no doubt is a most excellent man, but why it is necessary to make him a chief of a bureau, to change his title and to call his bureau the "Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics," I am unable to understand.

The designation "Bureau of Farm Management" is good, simple English and covers the whole thing. When the designation is enlarged from "office" to "bureau," we shall be laying the foundation for constant increases of force. I have watched these matters here for years, and I have seen these appropriations grow. I have watched this bill grow from one appropriating less than a million dollars to one carrying nearly $40,000,000. I think it is wiser to retain the old titles where we can do so, and where they are all sufficient. I do not see any object to be gained by the proposed change.

I have no doubt the committee have found the increases which they have reported to be necessary; but I do think this year we ought to reduce our appropriations to as low a point as we can, and one thing that we should surely do—and it is not particularly connected with this bill—is to get rid of needless and useless Government employees. It is for the payment of such employees that money is unnecessarily expended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The question is on the amendment reported by the committee. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask for a division.

Mr. LODGE. As I understand, the Chair is putting the question only on the amendment to a title of this office?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is all. The Senator from North Dakota has asked for a division on the question.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, I desire to say that I hope there will not be an adverse vote on the amendment. The committee, I am sure, went into the matter very exhaustively, and I wish that the entire Senate could have been present when earnest workers in the Agricultural Department came before us and showed how the men who had been trained in the Agricultural Department, especially in the scientific branches of that department, had been absorbed by other businesses at three and four times the salary that had been paid them by the Department of Agriculture. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will hear me when I say that the new Secretary of Agriculture had a list prepared, and when he came before the committee he showed how impossible it was to hold their scientifically trained men.

Mr. LODGE. Was that because of the use of the term "office"?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; because of the salary increases which they could obtain elsewhere.

Mr. LODGE. I did not speak about the salary increases.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I know the Senator did not.

Mr. LODGE. I was talking about the useless and what appeared to me the silly change of name.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; but the Senator's contention was that this legislation would increase the number of employees.

Mr. LODGE. I think it will do so ultimately.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. And that it would have a tendency to increase their salaries.

Mr. LODGE. I think it will tend in that direction.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if there ever was a time in the history of this country when every legitimate and intelligent aid that can be given to agriculture should be given, it is now. The census now being prepared is showing a startling and dangerous tendency of the population to move to the cities. Our production is dropping off. The "white lights" and the attractions and the high salaries that are being paid in the cities are draining the population from the country.

Mr. LODGE. I am not at all resisting the Senator on that point; I appreciate those dangers. I am objecting to only one thing, and that is the change of a perfectly sufficient, sensible name to a pompous name, and all being done for the benefit of the person who desires to be the head of a bureau and not of an office. It is the struggle for rank.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If we can by a mere change of name entice a worthy man to come in and be the chief of a bureau when we might not otherwise be able to do so——

Mr. LODGE. A man who is enticed by such a consideration would not be worth having.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. He might not be; but some of us are influenced by such motives. I am not using that as an argument; I am merely throwing it out as one of the human frailties that the Senator appreciates as well as I do.

This branch of the Agricultural Department is a bureau. If the duties in connection with farm management and farm economics are discharged as they should be, the place is worthy of the dignity of a bureau, because those duties are fraught with the greatest possible benefits.

Mr. LODGE. Does not farm management necessarily cover farm economics?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Of course, it does.

Mr. LODGE. Then why add the name "farm economics"?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is just like a larger circle and a smaller circle. There are things included in the term "economics" that might not be comprehended in the term "farm management."

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. EDGE. Is there not the additional possibility, in connection with adding to the designation "farm management" the title "farm economics," that it rather extends an invitation in succeeding years to subdivide the bureau into two bureaus? In other words, there are two general activities now included under the one name. Will not that be used as an argument in a year or two perhaps for subdividing that bureau?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the necessity arises, I think we shall have sense enough to meet it. It is not that we are going to allow a thing to be done merely because it may be done. I think the committee has had sufficient reason to incorporate this terminology. Farm management is a general term, while farm economics is a subdivision under the general term. As I said a moment ago, this is a distinctive work in itself that is accomplishing a great deal of good throughout the country. Of course, some of us are more familiar with the work than others, and hence I am making this plea.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I entirely agree with the Senator that the responsibilities imposed upon and possible good derived from the activities of the department may warrant an expansion—and naturally, I presume, that is the reason why the bill has gradually increased from $1,000,000, as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, to that of over $32,000,000—but I think it is hardly necessary for the Congress to encourage still further increases by enlarging titles and thus encouraging further demands in the coming years.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will yield to me for a moment, what they would like to have is titles for their bureaus that sound like university titles; that is the purpose; nobody is interested in it except the bureau chiefs themselves.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I do not think it is very encouraging to the agricultural interests of this country to animadvert upon the fact that the Agricultural appropriation bill has grown from $1,000,000 to $32,000,000, when the work of the department in connection with the foot-and-mouth disease, in the eradication of the cattle tick, in finding an antitoxin for hog cholera and stamping out that disease has saved this country fifty times that amount.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am not complaining of the expenditure; I think most of it has been very valuable to the country and has yielded great returns; but the building up of bureaus with imposing titles I think involves an expense which yields no profit whatever to the country.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not think the question of expense in connection with this bill is a just ground of criticism, and I think the chairman of the committee will so demonstrate. Never in my experience of about 11 years on the Agricultural Committee have I seen a bill so closely scrutinized and everything sifted so as to leave just what is essential without crippling the work.

Mr. LODGE. I have not attacked the amount of the appropriation; I know what good work the committee has done, and I have not reflected on it at all; but I do not like this system. There is a certain amount of fuss and feathers in connection with the titles of these bureaus and all that sort of thing that reminds me of the Mexican Army. The appropriations for the Mexican Army before the war aggregated about $25,000,000. They had an army—I am speaking in round numbers—of about 20,000 men. At the same time the appropriations for education were about $1,400,000, as compared to the expenditure for the army of nearly $25,000,000, and of the 20,000 men in the army 11,000 were officers. That made a very expensive army owing to the titles.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator is not drawing a parallel between that situation and this bill, I hope.

Mr. LODGE. I am not; but it is my little sermon on pompous titles which are wholly unnecessary. A man can administer this work and spend the money we appropriate just as well as Chief of the Bureau of Farm Management as he can by running in the phrase "farm economics" and trying to look like a university professor.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. As a matter of course, all these divisions could function without any names at all; we could put them all under the Secretary of Agriculture and require him to appoint different individuals.

Mr. LODGE. And I have no doubt we should get just as good results.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I doubt that.

Mr. LODGE. He does that now, as a matter of fact.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do claim that so far as the essential work is concerned, the additional title does not add to it or subtract from it, but it does define the duty and the office, and I see no objection to leaving it in that way.

Mr. GRONNA obtained the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I sometimes think there is not very much in a name, and yet, to judge from this discussion, there is considerable. What is in a name anyway? I do not believe it is very important whether we change this name or not, and yet it seems to me the reasons for changing it are good ones.

The Senator from South Carolina has said that he has served on the Agricultural Committee for 11 years, and that the bill now before the Senate is the most closely scrutinized bill of any that he has ever known. I have not served on that committee that long, but in a service of about seven years on that committee I have never seen a bill cut to the bone as this one is. I was one of the members of the committee that helped cut it; and I did not do it because I wanted to, either.

This bill is away under what the Agricultural Department ought to have. Every member of the committee who has studied the bill carefully will concede that proposition, and so will every other student of the work that is done by the Agricultural Department. It was not a question of what we wanted to do, but it was the more serious question of what confronts the country. This is a comparatively small thing compared with all of the others, but I believe that committee was impressed with the idea that if we are to save this country from bankruptcy we must cut everywhere in appropriations.

I voted in favor of eliminating from this bill appropriations that I have always heretofore favored, and under normal conditions will favor again if I am here. Members of that committee have been criticized, judging the rest of them by myself, very severely for the cuts they have made. Our mail has been full of protests; and out of the hundreds of letters that I have had in regard to the cuts that we have made in this bill I do not recall now a single instance where, under normal conditions, I would not have considered the criticism justified; but we felt that we were face to face with a financial condition that made it absolutely necessary to cut everything out of the bill that would still leave a nucleus sufficient to run that department until we might be favored with more propitious conditions and times.

If every committee having appropriations in hand will be as careful and as conscientious as the Agricultural Committee has been in making up this bill, we shall be able to cut the appropriations very materially. We injure the service. I admit it. I think this bill, passed in its present form, will in many instances be a serious injury. I know no way to avoid it if we want to get out of the financial dilemma in which we find ourselves placed.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. I do not question at all the arduous efforts upon the part of the committee to reduce the bill, or to prepare and present a bill which, as nearly as possible with the funds they thought they could spend, would meet the situation; but, as a matter of fact, the Senate committee have really increased the bill, as I understand, some two million dollars over the amount allowed by the House.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. So that really, in your work and efforts, you did grant some of the things that had been cut out by the other branch of Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; we felt that in some instances the House had cut too close. I think so yet.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I may say to the Senator from New Jersey, with the permission of the Senator from Nebraska, that at the time this bill was pending in the House it was understood that half a million dollars for the European corn-borer would be taken care of in another bill. There was not a single dollar appropriated for the eradication of the corn-borer in the bill as passed by the House. It was necessary, or at least the committee thought it was necessary, to put in an appropriation of half a million dollars for the eradication of that pest. That leaves about a million and a half dollars increase in this bill with all its ramifications and all its bureaus; and I want to say to the Senator from New Jersey that I trust the statement he made a moment ago was made good-naturedly about the committee increasing the total carried by the bill from $1,000,000 to $32,000,000. I can give the Senator from New Jersey some information with reference to the necessity of increasing this bill.

Mr. EDGE. May I interrupt right there? I am simply repeating the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts, without commenting on it in any way.

Mr. GRONNA. Let me say to the Senator, in all kindness, that we carry in this bill an appropriation which was never considered when the bill carried $1,000,000. We carry in this bill $100,000 for the eradication of the Japanese beetle, at the request of people from the State which the Senator from New Jersey so ably represents.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, when the country was first organized we did not have an Agricultural Department. If we are going back to prehistoric times we ought to abolish it altogether and save all the money carried by this bill. Would anybody want to do that? Is there anyone here or elsewhere who claims, or can claim with any reason or logic, that this bill is wrong because it carries more than the first Agricultural appropriation bill many, many years ago? Do we not all realize that the country is larger than it was then? Do we not know that that applies to everything else in our country, and that we can not continue the operation of the Government along lines that everybody admits have been and are beneficial if we cut down too low?

There are some things that we can not do. One of them is that if we only have $10 we can not pay a bill of $20. Another one is that we can not live as long on $10 now as we could 50 years ago. We can not help that. No Appropriation Committee of the Senate can remedy that condition. We are faced with present conditions, and I am one of those who believe that agriculture in the past has not had its fair share. I am one of those—and I have called attention to it many, many times, both in the Senate and in the House—who believe that the greatest danger, if there is any danger that lurks in the future for our Government, is this tendency to leave the country and go into the already overcrowded cities.

It is in the cities where the slums are. It is there where crime develops and grows. It is not in the country where those things exist. The free air of the country tends toward patriotic citizenship. That does not mean that a man in the city is not patriotic; but it means that the surroundings in big cities, not only in our country but in every country in the world, in all the history of the world, have been the hotbeds of anarchy and what is variously called Bolshevism now. Yet, notwithstanding that, I realize that the agricultural part of this Government must share in the burdens that are upon us. If we appropriated what we ought to have under present conditions, and if the same thing were done in every other bill that was passed, this country would go into bankruptcy. We would face an impossible condition. We ought to realize that, and we must have the courage to face these conditions.

We are going to be confronted with a proposition of doing something for the soldiers; and of all the demands that will be made upon us, I think it will be conceded that there is probably more justice in that than in any other demand that will be made—that we must perhaps do something for the soldiers who went into the war, and, because of their absence from the country and from their homes, were not able to make the money that those who remained at home made, and who came home, many of them, and found their positions filled by others. We have got to save everywhere if we are to meet that condition. I do not believe we can meet it fully.

I should hate to have my country now compelled to issue another lot of bonds. I do not know what that might bring in a financial way, and we all have our ideas as to how we might have avoided it. I have mine. I said once before that according to my ideas I think I could frame a revenue law that would bring in nearly twice what we are getting now without much hardship; but I will not have my way. I realize that other Members of Congress, in the House and in the Senate, just as patriotic and just as anxious to do what is right, have different ideas, and all these legislative matters are going to be matters of compromise; and I should like to say to the Senator that I do not find fault with anybody because he criticizes this bill. That is your privilege. That is your duty in anything you think is wrong.

It may be, in your judgment, that we have cut too close to the bone. If we have and you have the votes to override us, it will be your duty to do it, and no one will accept it more cheerfully than I; but I do not believe that any Senator, when he realizes the conditions that this committee faced, and the earnestness and the courage with which they met the obstacles encountered in framing this bill, can be anything except seriously impressed with their desire to cut appropriations to the very lowest possible point and permit the Agricultural Department to go on until we have conditions when we can increase the appropriations.

We are criticized by the Secretary of Agriculture, gentlemanly and courteously, but very severely. He objects very strenuously to the cuts that we have made. He says that in some instances he can not carry on the work. He is demanding larger appropriations in all lines and in all bureaus, everything that is under him. That is true of every other Secretary. The Committee on Naval Affairs are confronted with a similar condition, and yet probably they will bring in a bill here that is bigger than any we have ever had, even in time of war. Personally my idea is that we ought to cut more there and in the Army bill than we do in the Agricultural bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. What the Senator has said is only too true; but I want to say now that if the departments were given all that they have asked the appropriations for the next fiscal year would be $5,200,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. It would be an impossible thing. I realize that. It can not be done.

Mr. SMOOT. It is an impossible thing, and I want to say to the Senator that never in my life have I worried so much over the future of my country as I have in the last six months. Perhaps this is not the time to speak about conditions as I see them, but I do know there has got to be a change made in the way the American people are living to-day. There has got to be a stop to all the wicked waste of public money that has been running so rife in the last few years or there is going to be trouble; and I sometimes think that if the trouble comes it will be even more serious than the trouble that is being experienced in Europe.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not think there is any doubt about the truth of what the Senator from Utah has said. One of the things that has bothered me is that the extravagance which everybody knows has been going on during the war, the waste of money in a great many respects, is used now as an argument for increased appropriations. Every mail brings such arguments.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think the Senators ought to be so pessimistic about the situation as they are now. We have had times in the past when there was a good deal more of disturbance, and certainly as much pessimism, as the two Senators have just expressed. So far as the question of extravagance is concerned, it is true that the American people are a little bit extravagant, but if they did not have the money they could not be extravagant. We will come down to the time pretty soon when there will not be so much extravagance.

Mr. NORRIS. But, Mr. President, what I am afraid of is that we will come down with a thud that will jar us.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No, Mr. President; we will come down and land on our feet, just as the American people have done always.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope so; and when we get down the men who are now criticizing this committee and its members because they are economical will thank them for saving the situation.

Mr. President, I said awhile ago, when I was interrupted by the Senator from Oregon, that our extravagance which has been going on, much of it perhaps unavoidable, much of it, in my judgment, absolutely avoidable if the expenditures had been handled right, a criminal loss of money in all departments, which existed, nevertheless, whatever the cause was, is used now as an argument by business men all over the country. If they want an appropriation, they say, "There has been more money lost in the airplane business, or more in the Navy, or more in this, than we are asking in this particular instance," and all they say is true; I admit it. But, Mr. President, shall the fact that we admit that we have wrongfully squandered some money be a reason why we should now squander some more? We will squander enough; there will be enough lost through inefficiency; I realize that. I suppose there were places in this bill where, understanding the details, the committee might have gone even deeper. There are other places, probably, where good judgment would say they had gone too deep, and they may be wrong about it. We can not, any of us, always be right; we have to do the best we can, and one thing we must do, if we are to save the situation, is to be economical everywhere in little things as well as in big things. I think this committee has set a good pace. I hope it will be followed by the Naval Affairs Committee, and that they will do as we have done, that they will cut out lots of things, not because they want to do so but because they have to do it in order to keep our expenses within our income.

I am going to oppose, to the best of my ability, appropriations that do not follow that principle, and many of them I will oppose, Mr. President, not because at heart I am opposed to the particular appropriation, and not because I do not believe, in normal conditions, irrefutable arguments could be produced in their favor, but because of the very necessity of the case. We are confronted with the proposition of raising money, and will be in future tax bills, that is going to take the very best effort of statesmen, of thinking, honest men, regardless of political affiliation or business occupation, and when we get through with it we will not be satisfied with our own work. We will have to do in money-raising laws as we do in appropriation bills; we will have to tax lots of things that we do not want to tax, because it is necessary to get the money. We will disagree on some. As I said a while ago, I think I could levy a tax where it would not hurt anybody; but other Senators will not agree with me, and they will want to tax somewhere where I think it is wrong. The result of it all will be a compromise, and we will get some kind of a system.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, what is the system the Senator has in mind?

Mr. NORRIS. Briefly stated, Mr. President, if I had my way about it, I would do two things that I think would raise an immense amount of money. I would increase the already high rate on large incomes—a rate which I admit is high. I would do it not because I would want to but because we shall have to go somewhere to get the money, and we can not get the money unless we go where the money is, and I want to get it, if I can, from those sources where it will create the least hardship.

If I had my way about it, I would increase the income tax on large incomes. I would levy a tax of a progressive nature on inheritances. I would exempt a large inheritance free of tax, so that a man might leave to his family and those dependent on him enough money free of tax to keep them in comfort, and then I would commence the tax, and I would increase it until, when I got to the large inheritances which run into the hundreds of millions, I would take 80 or 90 per cent of what is left after the exempted part is taken out. That would raise an immense amount of money. An inheritance tax is the easiest tax in the world to pay, and it is without any hardship on anybody. It would bring in the money. It would not hurt anybody.

I do not expect to have my way about it; I never have had it. But everybody knows that if we are extravagant in appropriations we have to go just that much further in taxation.

We may have to issue some more bonds, Mr. President; I am rather inclined to think we will before we get through. Government bonds drawing 4¼ per cent are down to 90 now, or about that. I have not looked it up for a day or two, but they are in the vicinity of 90 cents on the dollar.

Mr. JONES of Washington. A little over 89.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Washington says a little over 89. Suppose we issued $5,000,000,000 more of bonds and were to try to float them. What would that mean? It might not be so bad if the Government bonds now in existence went lower, although I would hate to see it happen; but what would it mean to the bonds we were trying to sell? The result would be that the taxpayers of the country for every dollar they would get on the bonds would probably have to pay $2 or $3 in the shape of taxation; and that must come; we can not avoid it. The men and the women with bended backs now, who are toiling, would have to pay the tax. The Senator from Oregon says the people have lots of money, and some of them have, it is true; but, Mr. President, there are lots of them who are bothered now to make both ends meet when they are confronted with the present high cost of living.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator there? You can not charge those with extravagance who are so unfortunate as not to have money.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not charge them with extravagance.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I thought the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Utah were disposed to charge everybody with extravagance.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I was quoting the Senator from Oregon, who said the people had lots of money and would get down to a reasonable basis after a while. It is true that lots of people have a great deal of money, and this inflation of the currency, the logical effect probably following every war, which has now overtaken us and overtaken the world, probably something that will always happen under similar conditions, has a tendency to make everybody extravagant. That is the natural tendency. It has a tendency to make everybody ask for increased appropriations.

One day, Mr. President, just counting one day's mail, I had somewhere between 10 and 20 letters, most of them from commercial clubs and business organizations, every one of them asking for an appropriation. As I remember them now, practically all of them asked for appropriations which, under ordinary circumstances, I would have favored. I remember one of them was from the commercial club of one of the largest cities in the West, a club composed of the leading business men of that city. They wanted an appropriation to continue the air mail service. Under any ordinary conditions I would like to keep up that service, not because I think it is necessary to the Post Office Department, but because I think everybody realizes that we ought to keep, if we can, an organization of flying machines and flying men as a matter of military preparation. But, Mr. President, while we will have to keep some kind of an organization, I do not believe that under existing conditions, when we are confronted almost with the likelihood of another bond issue, we should go very extensively into that kind of a proposition.

The same mail brought a letter from a man who represented a good roads association. He called my attention to a bill pending in the Senate, and he demanded that I support that bill and said that 95 per cent of my constituents were in favor of it.

I have always been one who favored good roads and liberal appropriations for good roads, but that bill would cost, if carried out, as I estimated it, something like four or five billions of dollars in the next two or three years. I had to write those people that I could not support those measures; and as a rule I am condemned in the next mail.

Mr. President, the men who ask these things are imbued with what I said a while ago is a sort of disease of extravagance, which is all over the country. We see that they are in earnest about it, that they are honest about it, and under ordinary conditions they have an argument which can not be refuted, but they do not realize that their next town, their next neighbor, has some other thing just as good, and they do not realize that the other town, the other district, the other State, is doing the same thing, and that when you put them all together and center their activities on Congress in Washington, you have almost an impenetrable barrier which an ordinary Congressman can not stand up and face.

They do not realize that in the aggregate the demands which they are making of Congress would mean financial ruin to the country. It can not be done. If we undertake to comply with those requests, we will ruin our country, we will burden the taxpayers of the United States so that they never can get out from under. The time will come, when I have probably passed out of public life on account of the clamor, but it will come some day, when men like me, who by a great many people are called radical, will be looked upon as conservatives in the situation; and the time will come, it may be when we are dead, but it will come some time, when the taxpayers of the country will thank those who will stand out for economy in every possible line, and put behind us a great many good things because of the very necessity of the case.

In this Agricultural bill, Mr. President, we have struck out a lot of things that ought to be in, and I helped to strike them out. I am going to take my part of the responsibility for striking them out. The committee worked almost unanimously on this theory of economy, and we have gone on the theory that other committees are going to do the same thing. If they are not, then you can not apply the pruning knife to the Agricultural Department with my consent. If we are going to let the Army and the Navy and other things run away in extravagance, and universal military training and all other kinds of things come into the budget now, then I am not in favor of the bill that is pending here; it ought to be doubled at least. But we have gone on the theory that sober, patriotic Members of the Senate would take the same view that we believe every Member of Congress must take, that we must economize. We can not spend money without taxing the people, and we are taxing them now almost to the limit. New forms of taxation must be invented, more money must be raised, or bonds must be floated, which now is a dangerous thing. I presume, to float bonds and have them sell at par, they would probably have to draw a 6 per cent rate of interest, perhaps more; if we floated very many of them, perhaps 7 per cent.

We would either have to sell the bonds at a discount or increase the rates of interest, one or the other, and all that means taxation. It means for the dollar we spend that by the time we pay the dollar the taxpayers have to dig up about three dollars.

While I welcome criticism, I realize that the Senate, as far as this bill is concerned, has it in its power to do what it pleases with it, and I intend to abide by the decision, and not find fault with anybody. I want the Senate to get what I believe to be the viewpoint of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and then take such action as it thinks best. If the bill were postponed until after the other appropriation bills were passed, my action on this bill would depend somewhat upon what was done on the others. I know that is not a fair way to legislate, but we must measure everything by the same yardstick. In this bill we measure the farmer with an economical yardstick and we cut that yardstick down, and I want to say to you that if we pass the bill in the present form with that yardstick short and undertake to lengthen it out on the other appropriation bills, there is going to be trouble, and properly so.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived.

Mr. GRONNA. There is a vote pending, and I trust the Senator will let the vote be announced. There was a demand for a division upon the question.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed, in the subhead on page 5, line 12, to strike out the words "Office of Farm Management" and insert the words "Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics."

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 19, after the words "farm practice," to strike out "$250,000" and insert "$377,000," so as to make the clause read:

To investigate and encourage the adoption of improved methods of farm management and farm practice, $377,000: Provided, That of this amount $78,873 may be used in ascertaining the cost of production of the principal staple agricultural products.

The amendment was agreed to.

CIVIL-SERVICE RETIREMENT.

Mr. STERLING. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of employees under the classified civil service, and for other purposes.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in view of the fact that a reprint of the bill S. 1699 has been asked for and ordered, and in view of the fact, too, that I hope some time soon to get a unanimous-consent agreement to vote upon the bill on a day certain, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] may proceed with the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think I am pretty generally in accord with the suggestions made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] with reference to the treatment that should be accorded the different appropriation bills. I think that my course in connection with them will be controlled very much by the same principles that control him. I simply want to ask him a question about the amendment which we have just agreed to. I intended to ask him before he sat down, but he was practically taken off the floor by the hour of 2 o'clock arriving, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Senator, I think, stated when he began that he thought he could give good reasons why the amendment should be agreed to, which applied only to the name and why "Office of Farm Management" should be stricken out and "Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics" should be substituted. I am really interested to know just what the reasons were for that change.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know that I can give good reasons. I said in the beginning that I did not think it was at all important. I like the new name better; that is all; and the Agricultural Department likes it better. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] has given some reason for it. I do not think it is an important proposition. It changes the name, and the new name applies a little better than the old one to the activities and to the things that they do under the bureau. It seems to me it ought to be given the dignity of the name of bureau, although I do not care very much about it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, it is unnecessary for me to amplify on the question discussed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. He and other Senators have discussed the question in a very intelligent way, and I agree with the Senator from Nebraska that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry made every effort possible to reduce to the minimum the amount carried in the bill.

Before I discuss that, just briefly I want to say I had hoped that we might proceed to consider these items, not that I am going to ask anyone not to discuss any item in the bill when any information is wanted.

I want to say to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] that it is the intention of spending more money for this purpose and that we want to make this a bureau to give it the standing that it is entitled to. The Senator knows perhaps better than I do that a bureau has more authority than the designation known as an office. If it were not for the fact that I am anxious to go on with the bill I should take a great deal more time than I intend to to discuss the question of the cost of production and home economics.

I want to be pardoned for saying that almost any man can be a banker, almost every man with common intelligence can be a fairly good lawyer, almost any man or any woman can now be a Member of this body or the other body, but it takes brains to be a great farmer. That is something people have overlooked.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator permit a suggestion?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am not questioning anything of the sort. It occurred to me that the term "farm management" embraces all these things. I think I am as earnestly in favor of these things as is the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I know the Senator is.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not intend to start any discussion. I just thought I could have briefly stated the reasons for the change.

Mr. GRONNA. That is the reason. We want to expend more money and give this man more power than he has had heretofore.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator thinks under the term "farm management" there is a restriction or limitation that ought not to exist?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; there is. There is no question about that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I did not understand. It seems to me farm management embraces all those things, at least I would think so.

Mr. GRONNA. Let me say to the Senator that the Senate committee increased this appropriation by $127,000——

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator understands I am not objecting to this, of course?

Mr. GRONNA. I understand that. I want to be perfectly frank with the Senator, and I will state my reasons why we made this change. The committee believed that this is a question of sufficient importance to dignify with the designation of bureau. During the war everybody realized that the farmer was an important factor in winning the war, and I hope that we have not so soon forgotten the important part that the farmer played.

I hope that I may have the attention for a moment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], which I understand I will not have, but simply speaking for the RECORD let me call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to the fact that one battle cruiser will cost as much as the entire appropriation carried in this bill. The money is not expended entirely for agriculture. It is expended in the interest of those who handle the secondary products of the manufacturer, and I am finding no fault with that because ultimately it reflects upon the producer. We have here large amounts for experimentation in forest products. We have here appropriations for market reports for manufacturers. If you trim this bill down to the actual amount carried for agriculture alone, let me say to you the bill will not carry over $8,000,000. There is one item in it which provides $178,900 for soil survey. That is an item which applies absolutely to agriculture. We struck out the entire appropriation. Attention was called to the fact that most of the work is being done in my section of the country. I said that it made no difference where the work was being done, I believed that that is a matter which could be deferred at least for a year. An item of $239,000 is struck out for congressional seed. We have increased the total amount of the bill, and we have substituted some items in the bill which were entirely eliminated by the House, and I mention one of them, that for the cornborers. That applies only to a certain section of the country to-day, but what is harmful to one section of the country to-day will ultimately be harmful to the entire country and all the people of the country.

There is nothing sectional about this bill. We have increased appropriations for the eradication of the boll weevil and of the bollworm. We believe it is necessary to do so. We have decreased appropriations, in fact cut them out when they applied to sections of the country from which I come, so I hope that no Senator will undertake to say that the bill has been framed up on the theory that we have viewed it from a sectional standpoint.

I agree with every word the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] said, and with every word the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] said, and with what was said by the Senators on the minority side—the senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I know that we have $26,000,000,000 worth of bonds and short-time certificates outstanding, all drawing interest. I have tried to verify my figures through my friend the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who says they are correct. I realize as much as anybody that it is the duty of the Members of the Senate and of the House to cut appropriations wherever it is possible to do so, but we can not afford to do things which ultimately will destroy production. We can not do things which ultimately will mean that our people must go hungry, because that is what it means.

We have done the very best we could, and all agree with what the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has stated. We have cut this to the very core, and every appropriation bill which comes before the Senate I want to join with the Senator from Nebraska in keeping down to the very lowest possible amount.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to assure the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that there is no need of postponing consideration of the bill if it is to be based upon the fact that the other appropriation bills are not to be reduced. Where this bill will reduce an appropriation $1,000, I am quite safe in saying that others will be decreased $100,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, that would not be more than about a fair proportion——

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want the Senator to misunderstand me.

Mr. NORRIS. For this bill is so much smaller than the others. Where we decrease a dollar in this bill they ought to decrease $100.

Mr. SMOOT. I had no idea of invidious comparison, I will say to the Senator, but what I wanted to say is to substantiate the position taken by the Senator from Nebraska. The estimates made by the different departments of the Government must be reduced over $1,000,000,000. I know that in reducing these estimates a billion dollars there is not a head of a division and there is not a head of a department of the Government but what is going to find fault with such action.

I wish, however, frankly to say that if I had time to make an investigation into each of the various appropriations I have no doubt in the world that I could point out where more than a billion dollars could be eliminated; but Senators have not the time to undertake such a task.

There has been some debate in reference to a budget system, and I——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It might cheer the Senator from Utah to get the impression—and I think it will be a correct one—that the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate will reduce the estimates for the Army by at least $450,000,000—almost half of what the Senator desires to save.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if I desired to take the time of the Senate now I could call the attention of the Senator from New York to the fact that the House, in connection with the legislative appropriation bill and the sundry civil appropriation bill, have cut the appropriations to the very bone in some instances, and I hope the Senate of the United States is not going to be swept off its feet by the demands that have been made from all sections of the country for increased appropriations. There is not a Member of this body who has not received letters of the same character as those referred to by the Senator from Nebraska, and not 10 or 20, but hundreds and thousands of them.

It has almost become a practice, Mr. President, wherever there is a cut in a salary or in any kind of appropriation, for the individual, or the division, or the bureau, or the department affected immediately to get in touch with some organization, and a propaganda begins at once. Senators are bombarded with letters and telegrams by the hundreds, and not only with letters and telegrams but delegations are sent to Washington, and they occupy the time of Representatives and Senators, and very often to no purpose.

When interrupted, I was going to refer to the budget system, about which there has been so much said. I recognize that there has got to be some change made in the method of arriving at the proper amount to be appropriated for the respective departments of the Government. Our present system is that the head of a division or the head of a bureau—well, I was going to say the chief clerk of the division or bureau—fixes the amount which he thinks ought to be expended by the division or by the bureau. He looks over the employees that are under him and he decides which among his favorites shall receive promotions. Frequently it is considered a reflection upon him unless more employees are provided in his division for the coming year than were provided for the current year. Accordingly, he makes up his estimate. That estimate is transmitted to the head of the department, who knows very little about the details of the matter, with the exception of some particular item in which he takes a direct interest or in a certain appropriation in which, perhaps, he is personally concerned. Then, under the law, the head of the department sends the estimate to the Secretary of the Treasury, who pays no particular attention to it; and he sends it to Congress as an estimate. It comes before the Committee on Appropriations, and just as soon as that committee takes an appropriation bill under consideration, and a cut is made in the estimate submitted, we will say by the Secretary of Labor, down comes the chief clerk, and with him the head of the department in some cases, and, if not, the head of the bureau to explain to the Appropriations Committee why it is necessary that every dollar asked for in the estimate shall be appropriated.

Congress ought to have a bureau of efficiency, subject to it and under its control, its members to be appointed by Congress. That bureau, or commission, if it is desired to call it a commission, should be given absolute power to go into every department of the Government and to make investigations as to the need of every appropriation asked for.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to say to the Senator from Utah that there is already in existence a Bureau of Efficiency.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. Why would it not be a good idea to transfer that bureau to the jurisdiction of Congress, and let the Appropriations Committees of the Senate and the House use the experts of that bureau for the gathering of the information they require?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should be heartily in favor of that; and what I desire to do is to give that bureau, or some commission, if you please to call it such, the power to go into the departments and to make investigations. To-day they have no such power. The Bureau of Efficiency has saved to the Government of the United States millions of dollars. No matter what the press of the country may say about the Postmaster General, no matter what criticism may be heaped upon his head, I desire at this time to say that there is not an official in the Government service who has been more conscientious at least in undertaking to ascertain the proper amount of appropriations for his department and then in asking Congress for that amount and no more. I am not familiar with the workings of his department outside of the District of Columbia, but I do know that we never find the Postmaster General before the Appropriations Committee begging for appropriations that are not necessary.

The Senator from Nebraska referred to the fact that it would perhaps be necessary to issue additional bonds. We are not going to issue any more bonds, Mr. President; but there is under existing law authority in the Secretary of the Treasury to issue short-time certificates to the amount of $10,000,000,000, and no definite rate of interest is fixed by law.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator how many of those certificates are now outstanding?

Mr. SMOOT. Over $4,000,000,000 are now outstanding; and when June 30, 1920, the end of the present fiscal year, arrives we will find that the expenses of the Government for the current fiscal year amount at least to $3,000,000,000 more than the receipts from all forms of taxation and from receipts from every source.

That is not all, Mr. President; the amount of taxes that we will be able to collect under the existing law for the next fiscal year will not be sufficient to pay the running expenses of the Government. Where are we going to land? When will the time come when the appropriations for the Government of the United States will be met by the taxes imposed upon the people? It will not be long until the people of the United States understand that the taxes imposed means a burden directly upon every one of them, and when that time comes we are going to hear from the people, and we are going to be compelled to change our revenue laws as they exist to-day, for they have had just the effect that some of us predicted they would have when they were pending before this body. At that time I made the statement that the taxes imposed were nagging, irritating, and discriminatory in character, and the law would never be acceptable to the people of the United States, nor would they allow a Congress to pass without the law being changed, unless at that particular time it should happen that we were engaged in war.

I predict now, Mr. President, that just as soon as the next election takes place, and when we have a Republican President, a Republican Senate, and a Republican House, the revenue laws are going to be changed, and whatever taxes are imposed upon the individual citizen and upon the business of this country will be just, and not discriminatory. This is not the proper place nor the proper time to express an opinion as to what kind of taxes should be imposed, but I do not believe there is a Senator nor a Representative who does not understand that such a change must take place.

Mr. President, reductions have been made in this bill, although there is an increase in the amount appropriated over the amount carried by the bill as passed by the House; but since I have been in the Senate I think there have only been two or three appropriation bills—perhaps a few more—that have been decreased in the Senate. I do not speak disrespectfully of the House in any way, nor do I want it understood that I am casting any reflections upon the Members of that great body, but I say that many times appropriations have been eliminated from appropriation bills in the House with the avowed understanding that they would be placed back in the bill in the Senate. That has always taken place, and I think more than likely that it always will happen.

I care not whether the amendment is agreed to or whether it is disagreed to. I merely wish to thank the Senator from North Dakota for frankly stating the object of the change. I like to have a Senator who has charge of a bill, when he knows the object of a change, frankly state what it is, just as the Senator from North Dakota has done. I knew in the beginning that the object was as he has stated. How often have I seen the head of a department or the head of a division recommend a change in the designation of some particular office, and when you come to analyze it all there is at the bottom of the recommendation is an increase of salary.

I have not any doubt that this work is going to grow. I know what it means to the United States, and I know that I have voted for decreases in appropriations this year to which in ordinary times I should not have so voted. But the Government of the United States does not differ, except in size, from a family, and there are times in every family when it must cut its expenditures; and when that time comes, if the family does not do so, trouble will follow. The time has arrived now when the Government of the United States must look to the expenditure of every dollar of the people's money, cut out all waste, and do away with all that is not absolutely necessary, but make liberal appropriations for that which is absolutely necessary to maintain and operate the Government successfully.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 5, line 23, after the words "Total for," to strike out "Office of Farm Management, $322,130," and insert "Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics, $461,090," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics, $461,090.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Weather Bureau," on page 6, line 6, before the word "clerks," to strike out "eight" and insert "eleven"; in line 7, before the words "clerks, class 3," to strike out "eleven" and insert "fourteen"; in the same line, before the words "clerks, class 2," to strike out "twenty-three" and insert "twenty-eight"; in line 8, before the words "clerks, class 1," to strike out "thirty-three" and insert "forty-six"; in line 9, before the word "clerks," to strike out "twenty-six" and insert "two"; in line 10, before the words "1 foreman," to strike out "10 clerks, at $900 each"; in line 13, before the word "printers," to strike out "fourteen" and insert "twenty-four"; in line 14, after the word "each," to strike out "1 printer or compositor, $1,200; 6 printers or compositors, at $1,080 each; 5 printers or compositors, at $1,000 each"; in line 21, before the words "skilled mechanics," to strike out "five" and insert "twelve"; in line 23, before the words "1 engineer," to strike out "1 skilled mechanic, $840; 6 skilled artisans, at $840 each"; in line 24, before the words "2 firemen," to strike out "1 fireman and steam fitter, $840"; on page 7, line 1, before the words "1 gardener," to strike out "1 repairman, $960" and insert "8 repairmen, at $1,000 each"; in line 3, before the words "4 watchmen," to strike out "4 repairmen, at $840 each; 6 repairmen, at $720 each"; and in line 8, after the words "in all," to strike out "$346,910" and insert "$346,670," so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, Weather Bureau: One chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 assistant chief of bureau, $3,250; 1 chief clerk, $2,500; 1 chief of division of stations and accounts, $2,750; 1 chief of printing division, $2,500; 3 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; 11 clerks, class 4; 14 clerks, class 3; 28 clerks, class 2; 46 clerks, class 1; 2 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 foreman of printing, $1,600; 1 lithographer, $1,500; 3 lithographers, at $1,200 each; 1 pressman, $1,200; 1 printer or compositor, $1,440; 5 printers or compositors, at $1,350 each; 24 printers or compositors, at $1,300 each; 4 folders and feeders, at $720 each; 1 supervising instrument maker, $1,620; 1 instrument maker, $1,440; 3 instrument makers, at $1,300 each; 1 instrument maker, $1,260; 1 skilled mechanic, $1,300; 3 skilled mechanics, at $1,200 each; 12 skilled mechanics, at $1,000 each; 1 engineer, $1,300; 2 firemen, at $840 each; 1 captain of the watch, $1,000; 1 electrician, $1,200; 1 repairman, $1,200; 8 repairmen, at $1,000 each; 1 gardener, $1,000; 4 watchmen, at $720 each; 28 messengers or laborers, at $720 each; 6 messengers or laborers, at $660 each; 22 messengers or laborers, at $600 each; 11 messenger boys, at $600 each; 99 messenger boys, at $480 each; 1 charwoman, $360; 3 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $346,670.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 13, after the word "bureau," to insert "And provided further, That the proviso contained in section 11 of the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, shall not prohibit the printing in the printing office of the Weather Bureau in the city of Washington of the maps, bulletins, circulars, forms, and other publications herein authorized," so as to make the clause read:

For the maintenance of a printing office in the city of Washington for the printing of weather maps, bulletins, circulars, forms, and other publications, including the pay of additional employees, when necessary, $12,800: Provided, That no printing shall be done by the Weather Bureau that, in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture, can be done at the Government Printing Office without impairing the service of said bureau: And provided further, That the proviso contained in section 11 of the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, shall not prohibit the printing in the printing office of the Weather Bureau in the city of Washington of the maps, bulletins, circulars, forms, and other publication herein authorized.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 1, after the word "aerology," to strike out "$1,303,030," and insert "$1,373,430," and in line 2, after the words "to exceed," to strike out "$672,500" and insert "726,800," so as to make the clause read:

For necessary expenses outside of the city of Washington incident to collecting and disseminating meteorological, climatological, and marine information, and for investigations in meteorology, climatology, seismology, volcanology, evaporation, and aerology, $1,373,430, including not to exceed $726,800 for salaries, $129,040 for special observations and reports, and $295,750 for telegraphing and telephoning.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am not certain that I have the right amendment in mind; but one of the S O S calls to which the Senator from Utah has referred has apparently gone out to the country from Washington in connection with the appropriations for the Weather Bureau, and especially in connection with that part of the appropriation which is for the purpose of enabling the bureau to publish its weather reports.

I received word from an organization in the State of New York that is very much interested in the publication of weather reports, especially as they affect the fruit producers in the central and western parts of the State, saying that the appropriation had been so seriously cut in this bill that the Weather Bureau had announced that they could no longer issue the reports as they have been doing; and I want to find out from the chairman of the committee, or anybody else who knows, whether that statement is accurate. Of course, I realize that our committee has raised the amount under this item which the House allowed, but still somebody is creating the impression that the weather reports will not be sent out. Does the Senator remember what we gave them last year?

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator is referring to the item beginning on page 9, line 21, and going to line 4 on page 10?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. It is the item for collecting and disseminating meteorological, climatological, and marine information under the Weather Bureau. I will say to the Senator from New York that that matter was discussed very thoroughly, and I think it was agreed by the representatives of the department that they could do the work for the amount which we allowed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the Senator, then, if he can remember any word having been given to our committee by the department to the effect that the appropriations given to the Weather Bureau in this bill are so low as to prevent the sending out of the weather reports to the agricultural regions?

Mr. GRONNA. I never heard that statement made.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Somebody is saying it, and somebody is telegraphing it, because the telegrams have commenced to come in to me, which is the usual procedure, and I wanted to trace it.

Mr. GRONNA. Such a report is entirely unwarranted. I can not understand why such a report as that should be made, because there is an item here the total of which is $1,373,430, including not to exceed $726,800 for salaries, $129,040 for special observations and reports, and $295,750 for telegraphing and telephoning. Now, certainly, nearly $300,000 is a considerable amount for making reports.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I assume that that is the item.

Mr. GRONNA. That is the item. It can be used for no other purpose than for making these reports by telegraph and telephone, so that statement is entirely unwarranted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The telegrams that have been coming to me say that the Weather Bureau have announced that they can not make their reports.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Weather Bureau has made such a report, it has not made it to the committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I could not recollect it myself, and I wanted to find out what there was to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 10, line 10, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$1,532,100" and insert "$1,602,500," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $1,602,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, after line 10, to insert:

The Secretary of Agriculture shall cause the premises known as Mount Weather, situate at Mount Weather, in the counties of Loudoun and Clarke, in the State of Virginia, and comprising 84.81 acres of land, more or less, together with the buildings and other improvements thereon, including laboratories, cottages, sheds, stables, shops, heating and power plant, kite shelter, and other buildings of whatever nature, together with all the rights, easements, and appurtenances thereto belonging, to be sold at public sale and conveyed to the highest bidder for cash, first having given not less than 30 days' public notice of the time, place, and terms of sale immediately prior to such sale, by publication in at least two newspapers having a general circulation in the county or sections of the counties where the premises are situate, the net proceeds of the sale, after deducting the expenses incidental thereto, to be turned into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. SMOOT. This is the land owned by the Government just across the Potomac River, down by the aerial field?

Mr. GRONNA. I think it is farther out than that. It is what is known as Mount Weather, located on the top of the Blue Ridge Mountains, in Clarke and Loudoun Counties. The department wishes to dispose of it. I think it was stated that an estimate was made that they can sell it for probably $100,000, and the money will be turned into the Treasury. If we keep the station, of course, there will be a large expense connected with it.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator know how long the Government has owned the land?

Mr. GRONNA. I can not tell the Senator, but we have owned it for a number of years. Sums of money have been appropriated for it for some time.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The sale was recommended by the department, was it not?

Mr. GRONNA. Oh, yes. I have a justification for it, but it is rather lengthy, and I do not care to take the time of the Senate to read it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 4, after the words "Weather Bureau," to strike out "$1,879,010" and insert "$1,949,170," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Weather Bureau, $1,949,170.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Animal Industry," on page 11, line 8, before the words "executive clerks," to strike out "four" and insert "six"; in line 9, before the word "clerks," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty-two"; in line 10, before the word "clerks," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty-seven"; in line 11, before the word "clerks," to strike out "seven" and insert "seventeen"; in line 13, before the word "clerks," where it occurs the first time, to strike out "four" and insert "nineteen"; in line 15, before the word "clerks," to strike out "one hundred and sixty-one" and insert "two hundred and thirty-seven"; in line 18, before the words "1 architect," to strike out "15 clerks, at $1,100 each; 10 clerks, at $1,080 each; 12 clerks, at $1,020 each; 72 clerks, at $1,000 each; 14 clerks, at $960 each; 53 clerks, at $900 each"; in line 20, after "$1,200," to insert "6 laboratory assistants, at $1,200 each"; and in line 21, after the word "each," to strike out "2 laboratory helpers, at $1,020 each; 1 laboratory helper, $1,000; 1 laboratory helper, $960; 2 laboratory helpers, at $840 each; 1 laboratory helper, $720; 2 laboratory helpers, at $600 each."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if that means that we are going to pay $1,200 from now on to the two laboratory helpers at $600 each, and one laboratory helper at $720?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes, Mr. President, if this bill is approved these men will receive $1,200 next year.

Mr. SMOOT. That is a hundred per cent increase.

Mr. GRONNA. Many of these places have not been filled. The fact of the matter is, it has been impossible for the department to get men at these salaries.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state what I have in mind. If the Senator will look back in all of the appropriation bills he will see that the laboratory helpers in the Bureau of Animal Industry have been separated into different classes, some of them receiving as high as $1,020 each, the next class $1,000, the next class $960, the next class $840, the next class $720, and the next class $600. This amendment proposes that employees in all of those classes shall be raised to $1,200 each. I am quite sure, Mr. President, that that may be satisfactory for this year, because they all have an increase, but the next time there will be a division, and the low one will be $1,200, and then there will be an increase all along the line. Does not the Senator think that is rather an unjust way of providing increases?

Mr. GRONNA. I am free to admit, Mr. President, that the committee to a great extent followed the recommendations of the department with reference to the people who are paid these low salaries. I stated at the outset that there is no increase in the appropriation, but there is a decrease in the number of men employed, and it was believed that it was for the best interests of the service in the department, and that it would be in the interest of efficiency, to pay better salaries and in that way get better and more efficient men. That is the only reason I can give the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I am rather in sympathy with that, as a general rule; but if the Senator makes an examination, as I know he has in the past, into this class of labor, I am sure he would conclude that some of the laboratory helpers were just as good as a laboratory aid, and the only reason for the change in the salary paid was that some helper should receive more money, and the thought was first conceived to designate him a laboratory aid and pay him more money than the laboratory helper; and then, as I said, the helpers were divided into classes, and I know they are not all of equal intelligence, nor do they all do the same work.

Mr. GRONNA. That is true, Mr. President, and that is just exactly what Mr. Harrison stated. He said that in order to get the most possible out of these men, and to get efficient men, we must pay them salaries large enough so that they will be willing to keep the positions for some time. As it is to-day, they will employ a man and he will stay a week or two weeks, or possibly a month, and then he will leave. The Senator knows how unsatisfactory that is. Nearly all of these people have to be to a certain extent skilled in their particular work, and I really believe, while I am not in favor of increasing salaries at this time, that it is in the interest of economy to provide salaries sufficient to warrant these men in keeping their places at least a few years.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not opposing the paying of a higher salary.

Mr. GRONNA. I know that.

Mr. SMOOT. But it does seem to me that the danger in it is that you are putting all of the laboratory helpers on one basis of salary; and, Mr. President, if you will go down to the Bureau of Animal Industry and watch the work that is being done by those helpers, you will see that some of the work can be done by an ordinary laborer, while some who are designated as laboratory helpers are virtually assistants, and ought to be paid for that class of work. I think those assistants ought to be paid just as much as the man who is designated the laboratory aid.
